Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I make the same transfer that I made on the previous vote and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and I withhold my vote on that account.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] and its transfer to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. He is absent, and I refrain from voting.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made on the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAPP. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I do not think the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He did not vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and let my vote stand.

The roll call resulted—yeas 27, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Ashurst	Lane	Ransdell	Smith, Ga.
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Reed	Swanson
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Robinson	Thornton
Fletcher	Myers	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Hardwick	Newlands	Sheppard	White
Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Shields	Williams
Kern	Pomerene	Smith, Ariz.

NAYS—13.

Catron	La Follette	Poindexter	Townsend
Clapp	McCumber	Sherman
Dillingham	Nelson	Smoot
Gallinger	Norris	Sterling

NOT VOTING—56.

Bankhead	Cummins	Lippitt	Simmons
Borah	du Pont	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Brady	Fall	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Goff	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gore	Oliver	Stephenson
Bryan	Gronna	Overman	Stone
Burleigh	Hollis	Owen	Sutherland

Chamberlain	Johnson	Perkins	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Pittman	Walsh
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Root	Warren
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Weeks
Crawford	Lewis	Shively	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas are 27 and the nays 13. There are 5 Senators present who did not vote; but if those present were counted, as may be done under the rule heretofore adopted, it would not make a quorum. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Kern	Poindexter	Smoot
Catron	La Follette	Pomerene	Sterling
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Ransdell	Sutherland
Clapp	Lodge	Reed	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Robinson	Thornton
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Saulsbury	Townsend
Dillingham	Myers	Sheppard	Walsh
Fletcher	Nelson	Sherman	White
Gallinger	Norris	Shields	Williams
Hardwick	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.
Hitchcock	Perkins	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, until 12 o'clock m., Tuesday, December 29, 1914.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 23, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With inexpressible love and gratitude, our Father in heaven, we would draw near to Thee and pour out our hearts in thanksgiving and praise for Thine own best gift to the children of men, the "Light of the World," the incarnation of Thy love; the express image of Thy glory; the Anointed One, whom Thou didst send to preach the gospel to the poor, to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captive and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, and preach the acceptable year of the Lord. Hence, we pray for an universal faith which shall sweep away all doubt; an universal justice which shall right all wrongs; an universal love which shall dispel all hate, bringing in an universal peace which shall be stronger than war and unite all hearts in the glad acclaim, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." And now, O God our Father, as we separate to commemorate the Christmastide, open Thou our hearts to generosity and kindness, that we may give happiness to those in need, joy to those of our homes, and know the blessedness of self-sacrifice and bring us together again, the better prepared to do the work which waits on us. In the spirit of the world's Great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, I would like unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain correspondence and affidavits in relation to actual homesteaders living on lands now contested by a railroad company in the State of Washington.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by publishing certain telegrams, affidavits, and so forth, about homesteads. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of education.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the approval of the Journal? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House bill 6143.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill up last Wednesday when the House adjourned and which will be in order in a few minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I rise to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting remarks made by Mrs. Cushman, the mother of the late Francis W. Cushman, on woman's duty in politics.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Two or three days ago the President sent a message here, which was duly read in the House, about building a legation at Habana, and asking an appropriation of $100,000, accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of State to the Secretary of War, and the Chair ordered the message printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and also that the accompanying document be printed; but he did not notice that there was a plan of the legation in it, and, without objection, the Chair will ask that the plan of the legation be printed as a part of the document.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the Committee on Foreign Affairs desire to have this printed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair really does not know whether it does or not.

Mr. MANN. It probably will not be printed until after Congress adjourns if the plan goes in.

The SPEAKER. Well, let it stand over, then.

Mr. MANN. If they want it, all right.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 6867. An act to increase and fix the compensation of the collector of customs for the customs collection district of Omaha.

NATIONAL FOREST RESERVATION COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication from the Secretary of War.

DECEMBER 19, 1914.

The SPEAKER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: In accordance with the provisions of section 5 of the act of Congress approved March 1, 1911 (36 Stat., 961), I have the honor to transmit herewith report of the National Forest Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914.

Inasmuch as there is considerable demand for information as to the lands being acquired and procedure adopted, it is requested that in addition to the usual number of copies printed there be printed an additional 1,000 copies.

Very respectfully,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War, President.

The SPEAKER. The Secretary of War asks that 1,000 extra copies of this be printed. It is the report of the National Forest Reservation Commission. He says there is a great demand for it. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I think they ordered some extra copies printed in the Senate. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. There is another question about this. There are two maps to go with this, and the Committee on Agriculture wants the maps printed. Is there objection to having the maps printed along with the document? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This is referred to the Committee on Agriculture, together with the document, and ordered printed, including the map.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that it may be difficult to proceed with Calendar Wednesday to-day, and I am anxious to conserve Calendar Wednesday as far as possible, because there are some bills that ought to be considered at this session, and the only chance for them to be considered will be on Calendar Wednesday. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has some general debate if he can go ahead with the Post Office bill to-day. I would like to ask unanimous consent that the business of Calendar Wednesday be transferred until next Thursday.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much time remains for general debate on the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not mean to say next Thursday, but Thursday week from to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. How much time for general debate remains on the Post Office appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. Not quite two hours.

Mr. MANN. I am told by the gentleman from Minnesota that gentlemen to whom he had promised time are not present. One of them has been ill for some time and is not always present, but was here late last night. I think it would not be convenient.

Mr. MADDEN. Could you not consider the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MANN. You can not consider the Post Office bill under the five-minute rule to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We might go ahead under the five-minute rule, and questions that are objected to can go to the end of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that, although I think likely one of the first things——

Mr. MOON. What is the suggestion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To take up the bill under the five-minute rule, and the questions that are objected to go to the end of the bill.

Mr. MOON. We might do some of it that way, but that is a mighty unsatisfactory way of disposing of the bill. If it is satisfactory, however, to members of the Post Office Committee and gentlemen on the other side, I do not object.

Mr. STEENERSON. I did not understand the suggestion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The proposition is here that we pass to-day's business—Calendar Wednesday's—over to December 31, and that we take up the Post Office bill to-day and consume such portion of the general debate as the gentlemen are ready to consume, and let the balance go over, and then to read the bill under the five-minute rule, and any paragraphs that are objected to to go to the end of the bill, to be considered when it is taken up after the Christmas holidays.

Mr. STEENERSON. Any paragraph objected to?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] said he could not be here, and all the other members of the Post Office Committee belonging to the Republican side are absent, except the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. SMITH is here. I saw him about five minutes ago.

Mr. STEENERSON. I saw him, and he said he could not remain.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Is there not some of the general debate that can be had to-day?

Mr. STEENERSON. I suppose so.

Mr. BORLAND. Is there not some gentleman on that side ready to debate?

Mr. STEENERSON. I have not discovered any orator on my side yet, but I might discover one later.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me it is a good time to get rid of it.

Mr. MOON. I will suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] that we do not intend to use any more time in general debate.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have had only one application, and that for 10 minutes; but I want to give public notice——

Mr. MOON. Suppose you let that gentleman speak, then, if the others come in and want to speak afterwards, you may use up the balance of your time, so far as I am concerned, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STEENERSON. The understanding is that any paragraph that is objected to will go over?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Any paragraph that any Member does not care to have taken up to-day.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would say to the gentleman that I do not know whether the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who is very active in the matter, has any objection or not, but I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business of to-day, Calendar Wednesday, be transferred to Thursday, December 31, in order that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] may move to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to take up the Post Office bill, with the understanding that general debate may proceed as long as anybody wants to debate; that the balance of the time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] that is not consumed to-day can be consumed next week when we meet, and the bill shall be read under the five-minute rule, and any paragraph that is objected to shall go over to the end of the bill and be considered after the Christmas holidays, when the bill is taken up.

Mr. WEBB. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. That request would simply mean that the bill now pending on Calendar Wednesday will come up for consideration next Wednesday and not next Thursday week?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will go until Calendar Wednesday of next week.

The SPEAKER. The bill now pending would come up Wednesday of next week.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the business to-day under the Calendar Wednesday rule be transferred until to-morrow week, and that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the Post Office bill; that such gentlemen as are ready to speak in general debate shall proceed to do so, and whatever is left of that time shall go over, and the bill shall be read; and such parts of it as are objected to shall go over until the end of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I suggest it is impracticable and not a very orderly way to proceed to have the bill read subject to having provisions go over at the suggestion of any Member. We are not going to make any real progress by doing that. I have no objection to general debate on the bill to-day, and I have no objection to considering the bill regularly with the requirement of a quorum. But I do think it is wrong to consider matters and have them go over if anybody objects to them.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to make this inquiry: When the Congress recesses it will meet next Tuesday. If there is not a quorum in the city now, after 400 Members were here last night, I presume there will not be a quorum next Tuesday, and I do not see that you can expedite business any, because the Post Office bill will come up next Tuesday in the regular order of procedure. But would we be in any better shape next Tuesday unless some arrangement was made about Tuesday?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I find so much opposition to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], particularly from members of the committee, that I believe that I shall give notice that I shall not make a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider this bill until Tuesday next.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama this question, in view of what he just said about next Tuesday: Would it not be desirable to make next Tuesday a Unanimous Consent Calendar day, so that we may dispose of some of the business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar? It is almost certain that you can not get very far with the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Would the gentleman include in that the Private Calendar? We have not called that for some time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we will undoubtedly call the Private Calendar some time before the end of the session, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is the gentleman willing to take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar to-day?

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, I am willing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I first understood from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that he was willing to go ahead to-day; but his statement, just made, was that he desired not to do so, so that if that is the case there is no use in putting the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to postpone the business of to-day until next Thursday—that is, until to-morrow week—and, pending that, he asks the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] if he gets into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the Post Office appropriation bill to agree that those gentlemen who are ready to make speeches under general debate shall proceed to do so, and the rest of general debate shall go over, and that the bill shall be read and such parts of it as are not objected to by anybody shall be passed upon, and the parts to which objection is made shall go over. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want the Committee on the Judiciary to understand that so far as this shipowners' bill, to dodge liability in case of the death of employees and passengers, is concerned, in all probability it will be in the same condition when Calendar Wednesday comes as it is in to-day, because I do not intend to allow that bill to be passed until we get a quorum or allow the present status of it to be changed.

The SPEAKER. The chances are that there will be a quorum here.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] objects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] has indicated that he is not willing to go ahead with Calendar Wednesday without a quorum—and evidently there is not a quorum in town—that Unanimous Consent Calendar be taken up in lieu of Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Unanimous Consent Calendar be taken up to-day in lieu of Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would that mean also that the Speaker would have the right to entertain a motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I did not include that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] objected only to that part of the request touching the appropriation bill. I do not think he objected to the second part of the request of the gentleman from Alabama with respect to Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. He objected; that is all there is about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request that we may take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar in lieu of the business that is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar to-day instead of the business in order on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I feel obliged to object to that request, and I do it for this reason: The Unanimous Consent Calendar is one of the most important calendars that the House can consider, and each Member of the House is entitled to know when it is to be considered. To take it up in the absence of a large number of Members might not be doing the right thing. Therefore I feel constrained to object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to arrange for the House to work to-day without a quorum, which we have not got. It seems impossible to do so, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks the gentleman from Alabama to withhold his motion for a moment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withhold the motion.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, I ask unanimous consent, rather than make it a question of personal privilege, to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a personal matter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to rise for the purpose of making a personal statement this morning. I do not know whether under ordinary circumstances I would have done so, because much is said in debate that should be taken as debate merely and not too seriously; but so many Members have spoken to me about the comments made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] yesterday on the speech that I delivered here on the prohibition question that I feel it necessary, having read in the RECORD this morning what he said, to say a few words. I am glad he is here to take notice, because I was not present yesterday when his remarks were made. Had I been present, of course I would not have permitted those remarks and insinuations against my personal integrity, against my morality, against my home, against my children, to have gone unchallenged.

I do not want to magnify the importance of the gentleman from Washington. I realize that most of us have taken his measure in this House. I do not intend to be sarcastic in this at all; because the gentleman from Washington may be conscientious, he may not be hypocritical, he may not be demagogic, and I trust he is neither. But the gentleman from Washington has a flippant way of saying things about other Members. Some of us may be guilty of the same offense. The gentleman from Washington some time ago inserted in the RECORD certain things about——

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. MOORE. No; I will not permit the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. BRYAN. I will make the point of no quorum, then. I want it understood that I am to proceed after him.

The SPEAKER. Well, but the gentleman must obey the rules of the House, and he can not interrupt a Member when he has the floor without his consent.

Mr. BRYAN. I merely want it understood that I am going to make the point of no quorum, unless I am allowed to proceed after him, by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not make any such bargain with the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; and nobody else will make any bargain.

Mr. MOORE. I realize that the gentleman from Washington belongs to that element of our citizenship which believes its views must prevail, and which thinks there is only one side to a question, and that is the side to which it gives its adherence. He believes there are no two parties to any problem; and there are no rules that apply to a man who believes he has the right to do what the gentleman from Washington thinks he has a right to do, regardless of any rights that others may reserve to themselves or which they are entitled to under the rules or under the law.

Now, I do not intend unduly to advertise the gentleman from Washington, because I think that is what the gentleman is after. I think the gentleman's particular specialty here is to get as much notice taken of him as anyone may be inclined to give. I say this good-humoredly, because the gentleman from Washington is a good-humored man. But I wish to say that when he invades the privacy of my home and speaks of those things of which he does not know; when he undertakes to misinterpret my motives, which he has no right to do, I have a right to resent what he says. And I say this in all kindness, because if I were to attribute to him things which he did not believe, if I were to ascribe to him motives that did not accord with his own principles, he would have the same right to criticize me.

Yesterday I made a perfectly fair argument upon the prohibition question. It is in the RECORD and speaks for itself. I have conscientious convictions on that subject. I have no leader on either side of the question—neither a prohibition leader nor a liquor leader. The best guide I have is my own conscience, and my conscience is supported by my understanding of the teachings of the Master Himself when He came upon this earth not to punish but to save the souls of men.

The gentleman from Washington took exception to what I had to say, and made capital for himself before that vast audience which sat here yesterday throughout the discussion. As to me, he said:

> There is one gentleman who made a speech here to-day for the wets who, I think, is the most consistent of all who have spoken, and that is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

For his suggestion of consistency I am duly thankful, but his statement that I spoke for the "wets" is an inference and is not true. I did not speak for the "wets," as he understands them and as I understand them. I spoke for what I believed to have been the best thing for all the people under the circumstances. I took no side for liquor, nor did I undertake to defend liquor in any part of the speech. I spoke as a legislator, for that which seemed to me to be just and right.

> Who stood here and defended the saloon as an institution.

I did not defend the saloon as an institution. That statement is gratuitous; that statement is scandalous; that statement is untrue. The gentleman continued:

> And right along with it he defended open prostitution as an institution.

That statement is gratuitous; that statement is scandalous; and that statement is false. I did not defend open prostitution; I do realize what the gentleman from Washington and some others will not admit, that prostitution does exist, and in the spirit of Christ, whom they profess to serve, more with the lip than I do, I believe that something should be done to relieve that condition; to relieve and redeem those souls, if possible; to strengthen their lives, if possible, rather than by law and force, to ever and eternally curse them and send them to damnation. [Applause.] Upon this question I am no hypocrite; upon this question I do not vote or speak as a hypocrite. I realize that these unfortunate women are in the world; I realize that the cause of their sinning is man himself. I do not excuse the man, and I am ready to forgive the woman. I do not want to curse them nor deprive them of the right to fall upon their knees and ask for redemption. Christ Himself was crucified for doing that which some men are being crucified for to-day—standing for the rights of humanity.

The gentleman from Washington who is the representative of those who want to curse and eternally damn rather than save the wretched soul goes on and says:

> He believed that the house of ill fame was right as an institution.

That statement is gratuitous, maliciously scandalous, and is as false as hell. He continues:

> He did not defend the practices—

The gentleman from Washington seems to have had some opinions on this subject—> but he believed in maintaining the segregated district.

I have said here before that vice prevails. I am not satisfied it has been eradicated because we have passed a law. The question is one of treatment. I have heard of these women being taken from their haunts and driven hither and yon. I recall an instance where in a large eastern city a spectacular raid was made upon one of these places. The women were driven out, so that all the world might see, even the little children for whom men pleaded here so piteously yesterday—those little children who have been made to sign petitions asking sedate Members of Congress to vote upon these great moral questions, sometimes contrary to their consciences and convictions. I have heard of instances where women have been taken out to be made a spectacle of, and then when they appealed to those who pointed out their sins there was no helping hand, simply a curse and the advice to go on—somewhere, nowhere.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. I ask, Mr. Speaker, for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask permission that I may have as much time to answer as the gentleman from Pennsylvania; that is, that I may have eight minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks that he may proceed for eight minutes after the gentleman from Pennsylvania has closed.

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, I will say that I have no objection to the gentleman from Washington befouling his nest as long as he sees fit.

Mr. BRYAN. It will be the nest of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington must not infringe on any man's time without his consent. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have three minutes more and the gentleman from Washigton may have eight minutes to reply?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read enough of the speech of the gentleman from Washington. It is composed of scandal and billingsgate, and I suppose there will be more, because the gentleman is a master of that art—and that is about the only one that he is master of. I have observed his brief career in this House only and have not had time to hunt him up. He seems to have been something of a wanderer on the face of the earth, until he finally landed in the State of Washington.

The people there appear to have got his measure, for they have called him back from Congress. Let him, as he proposes, make the most of his invasion of my character. Let him go to my next-door neighbors to find out what they think of their Representative. I welcome the scrutiny. When it comes to the moral issue, when it comes to the question of right or wrong, when it comes to the question of sincerity or hypocrisy, I would a thousand times rather stand here and before God with the conscience I have than be a hypocrite and a scandalmonger, even though the galleries applaud it. Mr. Speaker, I guess that is enough. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, so far as the insult, the billingsgate that the inhabitant of Pennsylvania and the denizen of Philadelphia has just delivered himself of is concerned, I will say this: I am not at all surprised that that kind of language should come from him and that that kind of a position should be taken by him. What I said yesterday was, every word of it, especially so far as it referred to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, true, exactly as stated, and any statement that there is anything false in that——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Not until I conclude.

Mr. MOORE. I have just said that it is false.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must not interrupt without the consent of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BRYAN. The statement of the gentleman that what I said was false——

Mr. MOORE. I return the statement to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must observe the rules of the House, as well as the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I beg the Chair's pardon.

Mr. BRYAN. The statement of the inhabitant of Philadelphia is as false as his utterance was proprostitute yesterday. When we had up the Kenyon bill here the gentleman got down into the pit there, and about the only man in all the roll of all of the Members of Congress who would open his mouth on behalf of the restricted district of the city of Washington, and inferentially the restricted district of his own City of Brotherly Love, so called, was Mr. MOORE.

Mr. MOORE. Speaking for humanity.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, yes!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must not interject remarks while sitting in his seat.

Mr. MOORE. I beg the Chair's pardon again.

Mr. BRYAN. He opposed the principle of the Kenyon bill. He opposed the idea of doing away with these segregated districts, and then yesterday in his speech he backed up his argument made then by making that common brothel argument, that is furnished by every foul-mouthed brothel in the country, that when you do cut out the restricted districts you scatter the vice all over the city—just like he was making an argument that when you do prohibit a saloon you scatter the illicit sale of liquor all over the city, and here is what I said—and while he was speaking the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] said something in an undertone, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania retorted, "Perhaps you know more about it than I do." The gentleman from Ohio, who has the respect of every man in this House, certainly to as measured a degree as the gentleman—Mr. MOORE——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman to order. The gentleman knows the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The correct way to refer to a Member of the House——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word "gentleman." [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. BRYAN. Did I say "Mr. MOORE," or what did I say?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman did not observe the rules of the House, and if he does not observe them I shall insist upon his taking his seat.

The SPEAKER. The correct way to refer to another Member of the House is as the gentleman from so and so or as the Member, not "Mr. MOORE" or "Tom Moore" or anything of the sort.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, the Member from Pennsylvania—that is all right, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes; and then the gentleman can say, parenthetically, "Mr. MOORE."

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; Mr. MOORE made this remark to the gentleman from Ohio, and the gentleman from Ohio told me afterwards that it was about as gross an insult as he had ever received, a public insult thrown at him in that form; and here is what I said:

There is one gentleman—

I said "gentleman," and what do you think of that? [laughter]—

who made a speech here to-day for the wets who, I think, is the most consistent of all who have spoken—

Mr. Speaker, I did not accuse him of anything wrong—and that is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who stood here and defended the saloon as an institution—

Why, he told us that originally they had 6,000 saloons in Philadelphia, and that by benign and beneficient laws passed by the City of Brotherly Love the number was reduced to 2,000 and that it is the most law-abiding city in the country; and he defended that proposition and the licensing of saloons, and there is no question about his defending them in exactly the words I said—and right along with it he defended open prostitution as an institution. He believed that the house of ill fame was right as an institution. He did not defend the practices, but he believed in maintaining the segregated districts. He believed in maintaining segregated districts in this country for houses of prostitution, and the two go together.

I say that the gentleman made that identical argument, and it comes with very poor grace for him to come here to-day and say that a plain, clear, clean-cut statement of his argument befouls his nest; that a clear, clean-cut statement of the argument that he makes causes him to be accused of ill and filthy practices or views, or something of that kind.

I did not accuse him of anything in the world except his own language, and there is no gentleman, there is no fair person, who will interpret the remarks he made, who can fail to come to the conclusion that Mr. MOORE is opposed to the Kenyon bill, as he was here before, and as he expressed that opposition yesterday and gave the failure of the Kenyon law, as he alleges, here in the city of Washington as a reason and a ground for his support of the liquor interests or his opposition to the Hobson amendment. I certainly can not understand the processes by which any person could render any other judgment. That is exactly the fact, and he did make that defense.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the remarks that he makes about me and about my own standing in the community where I live do not bear out. There is no truth in it, and, as I have said before, his utterances along those lines are just as false as his argument was proprostitute, just exactly, and there is no question about his position.

There is no question about the views he takes, and when I said that the saloon and the brothel go together, when I said the segregated districts and licensed saloons were defended from the same source, I said exactly the truth, and I find verification for it in his argument. I did not mean to asperse the character of the gentleman at all. I gloried, I said, in his consistency, and I supposed that he would stand to-day for what he said yesterday. The matter of licensing houses of that kind is always brought up in every city where the liquor traffic is licensed, and it is argued that they ought to be licensed, that the women ought to be brought up and made to pay a regular license. That is the theory and doctrine of the restricted districts which the gentleman defended.

Mr. Speaker, I would say something about the character of the gentleman from Philadelphia along the line he spoke about my character, but there is nothing to it. [Laughter.]

HOLIDAY ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House, in accordance with the concurrent resolution previously agreed to, adjourned to meet Tuesday, December 29, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 29, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou dost fill our lives with precious memories. We have come out of the joyous season of the Christmas time, out of the holiest day in our Christian calendar, with the memories of home associations, the friendships, with the hopes created in us by the Christian faith, with the blessed ministry of a Christian civilization about us. We have come out of this holy season to address ourselves once more to the tasks of life. We remember the ideal life whose coming to the world we have commemorated, the standard of all greatness, the touchstone of all truth, the guide unto all the blessed destiny beyond us. Grant us the Christ spirit in all we undertake for our fellow men and for our country. Guide us unto great success and prosperity in our national life. We ask it for the sake of Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

NATHAN GOFF, a Senator from the State of West Virginia, appeared in his seat to-day.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE, PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., December 29, 1914.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. CLAUDE AUGUSTUS SWANSON, a Senator from the State of Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro tempore.

Mr. SWANSON thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed that the Journal of the last legislative day be read.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, December 23, 1914, was read and approved.

LEGATION BUILDING, HABANA, CUBA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of State, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting that the Secretary of the Treasury transmit to the House of Representatives an item for the acquisition of legation premises at Habana, Cuba, amounting to $100,000.

This request has my hearty approval, and I venture to urge this appropriation upon the Congress with great earnestness. I think that the whole country now sees how desirable it is that we should be upon the same footing of advantage in foreign capitals that other Governments are. This purchase is recommended in the spirit of the recent policy sanctioned by Congress in these matters, and I sincerely hope that we may not miss this unusual opportunity in the city of Habana.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 22, 1914.

[Letter and inclosure accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.]

RATES FOR OCEAN TRANSPORTATION (S. DOC. NO. 673).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 18th instant, a preliminary report relative to the increased rates for ocean transportation since July 1, 1914, together with certain facts which adversely affect or injure American commerce, and so forth.

Mr. FLETCHER. The communication is in response to a resolution submitted by me, and I ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

POWELL SCHOOL (S. DOC. NO. 674).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the acting president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for buildings and grounds, public buildings, District of Columbia, for an eight-room addition to the Powell School, $66,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

STREETS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 675).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting an estimate of appropriation for inclusion in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill for increasing the width of roadway of Fourteenth Street NW., between F Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, to 70 feet, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the year ended October 31, 1914, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the credentials of Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr., chosen by the electors of the State of New York a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1915. The credentials are duly certified by the governor of the State. The Secretary will read the credentials in full, and if there be no objection, they will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The credentials were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PERKINS presented the credentials of JAMES D. PHELAN, chosen by the electors of the State of California a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1915, which were read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer as Acting President pro tempore:

S. 6227. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Norfolk-Berkley Bridge Corporation, of Virginia, to construct a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Elizabeth River in Virginia;

S. 6687. An act to authorize the Chesapeake & Ohio Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Ohio River a short distance above the mouth of the Little Scioto River, between Scioto County, Ohio, and Greenup County, Ky., at or near Sciotoville, Ohio; and

H. R. 6939. An act to reimburse Edward B. Kelley for moneys expended while superintendent of the Rosebud Indian Agency in South Dakota.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER presented resolutions of the Municipal Council of Bolinao, Province of Pangasinan, Philippine Islands, favoring the passage of the so-called Jones bill, for the self-government of the Philippine people, which were referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a telegram from the Brunswick (Ga.) Board of Trade. It is short, and I would be glad to have it read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

BRUNSWICK, GA., December 26, 1914.

Senator HOKE SMITH,
Washington, D. C.:

This organization protests emphatically the action of the English Government in declaring naval stores and resinous products absolutely contraband of war. The South has suffered the loss of untold millions through the effects of the European war on her three great sources of wealth—cotton, lumber, and naval stores. If this action of Great Britain is allowed to stand, the naval-stores industry will be brought to a standstill and its recovery will require many years. No American industry has suffered such serious reverses as have been endured by the naval-stores industry during the past 18 months, and Great Britain's action may well be the blow that will kill this rich source of revenue and profit to the South. We urge you to use every means in your power to have the United States Government take a firm stand against this action of Great Britain.

THE BRUNSWICK BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a petition of sundry citizens of Long Island and Brooklyn, in the State of New York, praying for the prohibition of the exportation of contraband of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have received two telegrams, one from Bay St. Louis, Miss., and the other from Pascagoula, Miss., which I ask may be received and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BAY ST. LOUIS, MISS., December 28, 1914.

Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Announced intention of English Government declaring turpentine and rosin absolute contraband of war will prove seriously detrimental to the turpentine industry. Will you not invoke the influence of the State Department against such action on part of foreign Governments?

IMPERIAL NAVAL STORES CO.
HANCOCK NAVAL STORES CO. (LTD.).
JORDAN RIVER TURPENTINE CO.
HANCOCK COUNTY BANK.
MERCHANTS' BANK.
W. J. GEX.

PASCAGOULA, MISS., December 28, 1914.

Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I observe that the English Government proposes to declare rosin and turpentine absolute contraband of war. Such action would be disastrous to a great industry, in which a large number of people in this immediate section are interested. Will you not use your influence with the Secretary of State against the proposed English action?

J. I. FORD.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have a telegram from I. Wood, of Reno, Nev., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RENO, NEV., December 21, 1914.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN, Washington, D. C.:

The Business Men's Association of Washoe County, Nev., at a regular meeting, has instructed me as secretary to telegraph all Nevada Representatives to oppose national prohibition.

I. WOOD.

AGRICULTURAL COOPERATION AND RURAL CREDIT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate resolution 507, submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 214, part 1, Sixty-third Congress, first session, entitled "Agricultural Cooperation and Rural Credit in Europe," for the use of the Senate document room.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. My attention was diverted. To what document does it refer?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is the resolution in reference to Senate Document 214. The committee approved it this morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask how the document will be distributed when printed. Will it be allotted to the different Senators pro rata?

Mr. FLETCHER. They will go to the document room.

Mr. JONES. Then those who get there first will get the document. I shall object to the present consideration of the resolution. I have a great many requests for the document. I think the copies ought to be allotted to different Senators, so that we can at least take care of our constituents as far as the printing is provided for.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator from Washington there is no particular objection to that except that probably some Senators will not care for them particularly and there are others who will want more than their allotment. If the Senator will let me know how many he needs, I shall be very glad to see that he gets them.

Mr. JONES. If there are Senators who do not want them, they can very easily transfer their allotment to Senators who desire them. I have had 25 or 30 requests already, which I have not been able to supply. I am getting requests for it almost every day. It is quite a large document and quite an important one. I think it should be distributed pro rata among Senators, and those who do not need it can very easily transfer their allotment to those who do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Washington to let the resolution be considered at this time, when it will be open to amendment, and then we can provide for a pro rata distribution. I think his suggestion is a very good one.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection if the Senate desires to have the resolution amended so that they will go to the folding room instead of to the document room.

Mr. JONES. With that amendment I will have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let the resolution be considered and amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington object to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. I do not, with the understanding that the chairman of the committee will have no objection to having the resolution amended so that the documents will go to the folding room instead of to the document room.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JONES. I offer the amendment I suggested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the documents go to the folding room, does not the law require that they shall be distributed not only to Senators but also be sent to libraries all over the country, and have they not already been distributed in that way?

Mr. FLETCHER. A distribution of that kind has already been made, so that none of these copies will be sent to the libraries.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are simply to be distributed to Senators?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; to Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words "document room" from the end of the resolution, so as to read "for the use of the Senate."

Mr. JONES. That carries the document to the folding room?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REPORT ON RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 508, providing for printing additional copies of Senate Document 380, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 380, parts 1, 2, and 3, Sixty-third Congress, second session, entitled "Agricultural Credit—Land-Mortgage or Long-Term Credit," for the use of the Senate document room.

The amendment of the committee was, before the word "thousand," to strike out "10" and insert "5."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I think the resolution should be amended the same as the other resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out from the end of the resolution the words "document room."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

By Mr. HUGHES:

A bill (S. 7091) to create an additional judge in the district of New Jersey; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $130,000 for the purchase of a site and the construction and equipment of a building or buildings for a municipal lodging house and wood and stone yard in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19422), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $88,850 for the support and education of 250 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Wahpeton, N. Dak., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian Appropriation bill (H. R. 20150), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including secretaries to Members of Congress, who, by reason of the duties assigned to them, may be required to return to their respective places of appointment, mileage at the rate of 5 cents a mile each way, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 19909), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the employees of the Senate, who, by reason of the duties assigned to them, may be required to return to their respective places of appointment, mileage at the rate of 5 cents per mile each way, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 19909), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the support and education of Indian pupils at the Indian school at Bismarck, N. Dak., from $20,000 to $45,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 20150), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,200 for the salary of a chief clerk at the assay office, Salt Lake City, Utah, and also to increase the appropriation for wages of workmen and other employees at the assay office, Salt Lake City, Utah, from $1,500 to $2,000, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 19909), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 for the improvement of the Federal building at Billings, Mont., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000 for the appointment of temporary statistical clerks and stenographers under the Bureau of Labor Statistics, District of Columbia, to be selected from the civil service register and to be paid at the rate of not exceeding $100 per month, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill (H. R. 19909), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for constructing and equipping a lighthouse tender for general service, Department of Commerce, Bureau of Lighthouses, from $250,000 to $325,000, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 20241), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEE of Maryland submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $9,600 for the purchase of 12 small automobiles for the use of the police department in the regulation of traffic, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19422), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that in the expenditure of appropriations for public schools in the District of Columbia there shall be no discriminating charge made against pupils from any State or Territory of the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 19422), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill (H. R. 8846), which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LEWIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JAMES GARNETT.

On motion of Mr. WORKS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of James Garnett (S. 1652, 63d Cong., 1st sess.) be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADDITIONAL MINORITY EMPLOYEE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few days ago, on behalf of the minority, I submitted a resolution providing for an additional employee in the folding room of the Senate. The resolution was agreed to; but I find that even if provision is made for such an employee, as I think there will be in a pending appropriation bill, there will be no payment of his salary until the beginning of the next fiscal year. I therefore submit the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 510) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That an additional employee, in behalf of the minority, be appointed for service in the folding room of the Senate at a salary of $1,000 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

COPPER SHIPMENTS TO NEUTRAL COUNTRIES.

Mr. WALSH. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 511) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause to be transmitted to the Senate copies of all communications transmitted to or received from representatives of foreign Governments touching the seizure or detention by any belligerent nation of shipments of copper from the ports of the United States consigned to neutral countries of Europe.

Copies of any communications so transmitted or received touching the proclamations of certain of the belligerents declaring copper to be either conditional or absolute contraband.

Copies of any such communications touching the declaration made in proclamations of certain of the belligerents to the effect that articles scheduled by them as conditional contraband shall be liable to capture on board a vessel bound for a neutral port, if the goods are consigned to order, and the further declaration therein that such goods shall be subject to confiscation unless the owners prove an innocent destination.

And copies of any communications touching the following recital of the so-called Declaration of London Order in Council, No. 2, 1914, to wit:

"2. Where it is shown to the satisfaction of one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state that the enemy Government is drawing supplies for its armed forces from or through a neutral country, he may direct that, in respect of ships bound for a port in that country, article 35 of the said declaration shall not apply. Such direction shall be notified in the London Gazette and shall operate until the same is withdrawn. So long as such direction is in force a vessel which is carrying conditional contraband to a port in that country shall not be immune from capture."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Thursday morning next, immediately before the conclusion of the morning business, I shall address the Senate on the subject matter contained in the resolution.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to say that in naming the delegates from Southern States to the Constitutional Convention of 1787 in my address of Friday, December 18, I gave only those who signed the Constitution after its completion. I intended also to give the names of others who participated in the convention from these States, but neglected to do so. They were Edmund Randolph, George Mason, George Wythe, and James McClurg, from Virginia; Alexander Martin and William Richardson Davie, from North Carolina; William Pierce and William Houstoun, from Georgia; John Francis Mercer and Luther Martin, from Maryland. Of these delegates John Francis Mercer and Luther Martin, of Maryland; George Wythe and James McClurg, of Virginia; Alexander Martin and William Richardson Davie, of North Carolina; William Pierce and William Houstoun, of Georgia, were not present on the last day of the convention and failed to sign. Edmund Randolph and George Mason, of Virginia, were the only ones present on the last day who refused to sign. The name Jacob "Brown," as it appears in the RECORD, should be Jacob Broom; that of "Hu" Williamson should be Hugh Williamson.

I intended also to refer in that address to the tenth amendment to the Constitution, and to say that, like the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions, it was aimed at the assumption of undelegated powers by the General Government and contradicted in no sense the right of the peoples of the States to grant further powers through the regular process of amendment. In support of this statement I wish to cite an excerpt from the Supreme Court of the United States in Kansas against Colorado, Two hundred and sixth United States, page 46, in which the opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer. The excerpt is as follows:

But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation as a whole which belong to, although not expressed in, the grant of powers is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a Government of enumerated powers. That this is such a Government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. It reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The argument of counsel ignores the principal factor in this article, to wit, "the people." Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the States, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it—"we, the people of the United States," not the people of one State, but the people of all the States—and Article X reserves to the people of all the States the powers not delegated to the United States. The powers affecting the internal affairs of the States not granted to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively, and all powers of a national character which are not delegated to the National Government by the Constitution are reserved to the people of the United States. The people who adopted the Constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States, and after making provision for an amendment to the Constitution by which any needed additional powers would be granted they reserved to themselves all powers not so delegated.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair will declare morning business closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a telegram from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], stating that his train has been delayed some two or three hours and requesting me to submit a motion to the Senate which he would make if he were present. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6060, being the immigration bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the one offered by Mr. THOMAS, as modified, proposing to strike out certain words on page 9, lines 6 to 12, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the following classes of persons, when otherwise qualified for admission under the laws of the United States, shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious, political, or racial persecution, whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I am opposed to the literacy test embodied in the pending bill; but, if it is to be the judgment of the Senate that it should be retained, I am in favor of the amendment now pending, which extends the immunity class of aliens so as to embrace those who are escaping racial persecution as well as political and religious persecution.

Mr. President, when it is proposed to abandon a policy which has contributed much to the greatness of the Republic, the advocates of the plan might properly be expected to present some reasons justifying the departure which they recommend. The reasons that have been advanced are not persuasive to me, and to my mind furnish a wholly inadequate basis for the suggestion that a policy which has been favored by this Government since its beginning should now be cast aside.

The policy of the American Government has always been to encourage free and unrestricted immigration. We have held out our country as the asylum of the oppressed of all the world, and because of that policy we have seen our settlement of three millions of people, scattered along the Atlantic coast, grow in a little more than a century to one of the great and powerful nations of the earth.

What reasons are suggested for the abandonment of this policy at this time? It is said that ignorance is a menace in a republic. I deny it. Ignorance may be a misfortune, but it ill becomes a nation boasting our ideals to penalize the victims of that misfortune. Besides, this proposed literacy test, which is designed to check and prevent immigration, is not confined to the exclusion of the ignorant. A man may be illiterate and yet not ignorant. It has been within the observation of all of us that there are many intelligent men who are nevertheless illiterate, as that term is understood. My mind reverts to a citizen of a Southern State who was one of the most intelligent men in his community, and yet he could neither read nor write. He was a good, law-abiding, industrious citizen, willing to support his Government in time of peace and, if need be, in time of war to give his life in defense of the liberties of the Republic. Was he an undesirable citizen? He was without education, but a son of that illiterate was elevated to the high post of attorney general of his State and another son came to the House of Representatives and made a brilliant reputation that survived his departure from that body.

I knew a resident of a New England State who never knew the privilege of learning to read and write, but he was a good, honest, industrious citizen. I would match his patriotism against that of any Member of this body. In his simple way he contributed something to the community in which he lived, and when he died his influence permeated that State in the splendid achievements of two of his sons who had won rank and reputation as clergymen and another of whom was elevated to the bench of one of the high courts of another State. No, Senators, it is a mistake to urge that an illiterate is ignorant; I deny it.

Those aliens who are undesirable are provided against by other and specific provisions of this bill. Of course it is said that while this system may not be the best means of excluding undesirable aliens, it is, nevertheless, as good as any that has been proposed. I deny that. We have in other parts of this bill safe and adequate provisions tending to exclude from our shores all undesirable aliens. It provides for the exclusion specifically of all immigrants who are mentally, morally, and physically unfit. We provide for the exclusion of the criminal and the vicious. We provide specifically for the exclusion of all who may become a charge upon any State or upon any community. How much further should you go? Have you not embraced within those classes all who would be undesirable? If you have, what excuse is there for imposing for the first time in the history of the Republic an educational test upon those who seek the opportunities and are willing to assume the burdens of living with us in this country.

Why, Senators, if this educational test had been applied years ago its operation would have excluded the parents of at least one if not two citizens of this Republic who have occupied the White House. It would have excluded from our shores Nancy Hanks, the sainted mother of Abraham Lincoln. It would have made impossible the entrance into our country of President Andrew Johnson, who never knew how to write his name or read a line until he was taught by his wife after his marriage. If that test had been applied years ago, there are honorable and distinguished Members of this exalted body who would not to-day be occupying seats in this Chamber.

Senators, we are all a nation of immigrants. Every white man in the United States to-day is either an immigrant or the descendant of an immigrant. How can you justify yourselves now in violating the ideals that you have preached for a century and, with the quintessence of selfishness and ingratitude, be willing to close the doors and shut the gates upon those unhappy people in other lands who are looking forward to the day when they may be free men upon the free soil of this great Republic?

It is suggested that by permitting free and unrestricted immigration we are doing some injustice to American workmen; that the foreigner comes into competition with American labor. Senators, that has been true for a century; and what is the result of this competition, such as it has been, for that long time? In no place in all the world are the wages of the laborer and workman so high and the hours of service so short as in the United States.

But it is not correct to say that the immigrant comes into competition with American workmen. The work that every succeeding generation of immigrants does is the work that the American will not do. They carry on the tiresome grind with which the American workman will not stain his hand. It is the most unremunerative work. It is the work of building your railroads, of excavating your tunnels, and doing all of that class of work that fortunately the American workman does not find it necessary for him to undertake. Check this immigration and you paralyze our development and arrest the progress of the Nation. We have no better educated nor more patriotic citizenship than the children of the sturdy, though illiterate, aliens who throng to our shores. The percentage of literacy among the children of alien parentage is far higher than among the children of native whites. Immigrants and their offspring have done their share in building up our country and developing its resources. Unskilled labor, which the country needs on the farm and in the workshops and in great mining and railroading enterprises, must necessarily be recruited from the illiterate aliens. The value of the immigrant does not depend upon his ability to read 40 words. It depends upon his industrial capacity, his usefulness for the work of the country, and his probable behavior as a law-abiding citizen. A man meeting these reasonable tests has an economic value which it would be unwise to destroy. A man may be able to read 40 words and yet meet none of these safe and sane requirements which make for character and usefulness.

It is suggested as a reason for this extraordinary departure in our national policies that our country is now crowded, and that policies that we might have permitted 60 or 70 years ago can not safely be continued. Why, Senators, we have in continental United States 3,000,000 square miles of territory, an area twelve times as large as that of Germany. If it be assumed that we have a population of 100,000,000, it means that at the present time we have an average of but 33 persons for every square mile of United States territory. Before the disastrous war that is now afflicting Europe the average population there was 500 persons to the square mile. In Belgium alone it was 650 persons to the square mile. If we assume that a country will maintain 500 persons to the square mile—and the experience of all history demonstrates that that number can be maintained—then, with our vast area, we will not be overcrowded, we will not even approach that condition, until we have a population of 1,500,000,000, something which, in the course of nature, if it ever occurs, can not occur for many centuries.

There are in this country vast tracts of uncultivated and undeveloped land. Why should we not encourage the ambitious, the sturdy, the industrious alien to come and help us till and develop these sections of our country? Our country is in need of development through industrious muscle and brawn. We should welcome men of enterprise, of push, of energy. The aliens who seek admission to our country are men of this type or they would not come. The man who leaves his home and friends in Europe and undergoes the hardship and danger of a long ocean voyage, stimulated by the hope of bettering his condition in life, must be a man of energy and ambition, and these qualities make for desirable citizenship. Our country with its vast area is comparatively uninhabited. We have room and pressing need for more people in time of peace as well as in time of war. Our natural increase is insufficient for the needs and development of our country.

Extraordinary as this departure is from a governmental standpoint, the attitude of the Democratic Party on this question is still more extraordinary. From the earliest days the Democratic Party has been the liberal party. It has been the party that was always prepared to extend a welcome to the foreigner if he was worthy to take his place in this country. It is not surprising that the Republican Party takes the other side of this proposition. It has declared in its national platform in favor of a literacy qualification. The Democratic Party never made such a declaration, and the representatives of the Democratic Party have no commission from the people of the country to give their aid and encouragement to an un-Democratic and un-American law which excludes the worthy foreigner from a place in this Republic. Presidents Cleveland and Taft have vetoed similar laws, and as recently as 1892 the Democratic Party, in national convention, declared as follows:

We condemn and denounce any and all attempts to restrict the immigration of the industrious and worthy of foreign lands.

Enact this law and you repudiate this declaration.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to say a word intended especially for my Democratic brethren. The political prospects of our party are not as bright as we would like them to be today. Republicans are asserting, with apparent confidence, that in the contest two years from now the Democratic Party will be unable to carry a single State north of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi. Some little support is given to those Republican claims by a declaration made but a day or two ago by the governor of a great Democratic State in the South. Political predictions two years in advance are not of much value, and I believe these Republican predictions will not be realized. But we should not ignore the existing conditions. One thing is certain, there is no demand in the North for this literacy inhibition and disqualification. Do you wish to make our struggle two years from now worse than it naturally must be by estranging from us thousands and hundreds of thousands who, if this bill is passed, will say that while the Republican Party was once the exclusive party the Democratic Party has taken its place, and that having repudiated its historic attitude toward the foreign born now has become the party of exclusion?

I urge you, Senators, before you give your approval to this literacy test, to think of our political necessities in the North. In this connection let me say frankly, and with the best and kindest spirit, that I can not understand why my distinguished brethren from Southern States, who are comparatively strangers to the immigration problem, are so insistent that immigration must be checked when the number of foreign illiterates in their States is insignificant; only 1,000, 2,000, or 3,000 in some instances, while even among the white natives the illiteracy runs as high as fifty and seventy thousand. Why, I ask, are those who apparently are not immediately concerned with this great problem so insistent upon closing the doors to the worthy alien who is ambitious to enjoy the opportunities and to assume the responsibilities that attach to our citizenship?

Let me assure you, Senators, that there is no demand in the Democratic Party in the North for this restrictive policy, for this repudiation of the professions of the Democratic Party of 125 years. The great Democracy of New York has not asked for it; and I want to say again, and remind my southern friends, that it may happen in the future, as it has happened in the past, that when the solid Democracy of the South looked upon the horizon the only kindly, sympathetic spot on this continent which gave comfort to their gaze and encouragement to their hopes was the State of New York, which did not falter in its devotion to the Democratic Party when a hostile political doctrine dominated the rest of the country excepting the Southern States.

You have heard from the distinguished senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], who is competent to speak for the Democracy of his State. He protests against it. I have not yet heard a single favorable opinion of the proposed policy from anyone competent to speak for the Democracy of the North. Surely the great State so well represented by my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] does not ask for it, and will protest against it. What is to be gained by it?

I ask those who advocate this restrictive policy what is to be gained by it? We need immigration. Why, we need it more than some of us appreciate. Do you stop to realize that the birth rate among the native Americans is year by year getting lower and lower? Fortunately, in that respect we are not so badly off as France, but we may profit by her example. At the time of the Franco-Prussian War—44 years ago—France had a population of 37,000,000; Germany had 40,000,000. In the intervening 44 years the population of Germany has increased to 70,000,000, while the French are almost where they were 44 years ago, because they only show a net increase of 2,000,000. If we do not encourage foreign immigration, the consequences will be upon our own heads; the misfortune will be felt by the American people.

Mr. President, the agitation for the exclusion of the immigrant at this time seems to be one of the manifestations of hysteria now afflicting the American people. They want change. They want experiment. There was a time in our history when we were regarded as an indestructible Union of indestructible States. Nearly every one of the great propositions urged in the Congress in the recent past has been entirely destructive of State rights. The wisdom of the fathers is no longer respected. There are those who think they can improve upon the work of the venerable men who made our Constitution. A movement is now engaging the attention of the country by which a number of States are eager to impose on unwilling States their belief in prohibition. There are other States that are seeking to impose on unwilling States their views regarding woman suffrage. In the consideration of this bill there are States having no immediate interest in the subject that are striving to interfere with the liberty of the States that are willing to encourage immigration—that want immigration. When will an end come to this extraordinary hysteria and its manifestations?

Mr. President, for myself, I believe this proposed legislation unwise and destructive of the best interests of this country. I hope it will not have the approval of this body. If, unfortunately, it should receive its approval, then I hope the amendment which was proposed by the distinguished and able Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and to which I took the liberty of proposing an amendment, will be adopted; that is, that the classes to be immune from the literacy test shall not only be those who come to this land seeking to escape religious and political persecution, but that they shall also embrace those who come here seeking to escape racial persecution.

What is the reason for any differentiation of those three elements? It is persecution whose victims we are trying to relieve by this legislation. We might eliminate all these adjectives and say that an alien shall not be required to comply with the literacy test if he comes here seeking to escape persecution. It is of little concern to us whether the persecution he is escaping is religious, political, or racial. It is the persecution itself which ought to warrant us in making a reservation in this bill if, unhappily, we adopt the literacy test.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am very much interested in the Senator's discussion of this question, and if he has given any thought to the phase of it which I am about to mention, I should like to have him discuss it before he takes his seat. Does the Senator know, or is there any way by which he can approximate, what percentage of the immigrants that come to this country go to the rural districts?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have not that information; but there are active agencies at work now in my State encouraging the immigrants to go out through the country to the farms and parts of the country where they are needed, as can be testified to by other Senators in this body.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think, though, one of the great dangers that confronts us and which immigration accelerates is the urbanization of our population. While my information is not accurate or extensive, my understanding is that a very large percentage of the people who come here stop in the cities.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Granting that, Senator, do you appreciate how beneficial it is to Mississippi and other Southern States that supply our food market that when we have a large population in the city of New York your State and other similar States indirectly derive an advantage from it? Mr. President, I may on another occasion trespass upon the indulgence of the Senate to submit some further observations in connection with the pending legislation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I can not sympathize with him in his idea of sectionalizing this question. We are a united and harmonious whole as a Government, and you can not create an economic sore or a social evil in any section of the entire country without hurting the whole. These questions are not local issues; they are national.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have concluded, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. I wish to inquire if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] desires to speak at this time. If he does, I shall be very glad to yield to him.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator from Missouri I understand the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] expects to follow the Senator from New York if the Senator from Missouri has no objection.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It makes no difference to me when I proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. I am sure the Senator from Missouri would prefer to defer a little while.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, in view of the range which the discussions have taken upon this question, I feel rather impelled to address myself to that feature of the bill that deals with the literacy test, and in doing that to examine to some extent the history of immigration legislation, the investigation of immigration conditions which has been made by the commission appointed for that purpose, and the reasons upon which they recommend the adoption of the literacy test as the one most feasible method of restricting certain classes of immigration which seem undesirable.

I wish to say in this connection that when I entered the Senate I was opposed to any restrictive measure whatever. I believed with the Senator from New York that our area was so great, our resources so unbounded, that we were able to receive aliens in unlimited numbers from every part of Europe, to utilize them, to assimilate them, and make it to their advantage and our own to have them come.

During the years I have served upon the Committee on Immigration, and especially since serving as a member of the Immigration Commission which made an exhaustive examination of this subject, I have been compelled to reverse my opinions and have come to favor some measure that shall in some degree restrict certain streams of immigration which have more recently been coming to our country.

In order to understand the situation we must remember that down to 1882 there was no Federal legislation regulating immigration into this country. In that year legislation was adopted which had for its basis the principle of selection. In other words, all legislation from that time until the present has been based upon the principle that all shall be admitted who are sound in body, sound in mind, and of good moral character. The object of all legislation has been to reject those who were unsound in body and unsound in mind and who were undesirable by reason of their personal character.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE IMMIGRATION COMMISSION.

The law of 1907 was simply the old law rewritten with amendments added to make the selections more perfect, but in that law there was a provision providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate all phases of the subject of immigration. The commission spent three years in its work and has made its report, which is contained in 41 volumes, the first two of which contain a summary of everything contained in the entire number.

The scope of its work I do not need to describe at this time. It is sufficient to say that it covered every phase of the subject both in this country and abroad. The pending measure is the existing law, with such provisions added as were recommended by the Immigration Commission and which have been recommended also by the Department of Labor, the latter mostly of an administrative character.

The most important provision in this bill—the one which has been most discussed—is that providing for the literacy test. Inasmuch as the discussion has indicated that this is looked upon as a moral test, a quality test, rather than a restrictive test, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the statement of the Immigration Commission upon that subject. I read from their recommendation on page 45 of volume 1, where they say:

> The measure of the rational, healthy development of a country is not the extent of its investment of capital, its output of products, or its exports and imports, unless there is a corresponding economic opportunity afforded to the citizen dependent upon employment for his material, mental, and moral development.
> The development of business may be brought about by means which lower the standard of living of the wage earners. A slow expansion of industry which would permit the adaptation and assimilation of the incoming labor supply is preferable to a very rapid industrial expansion which results in the immigration of laborers of low standards and efficiency, who imperil the American standard of wages and conditions of employment.

The commission made a number of recommendations, which I omit at this time, but I direct attention to paragraph 8 of their recommendations, where they say:

> The investigations of the commission show an oversupply of unskilled labor in basic industries to an extent which indicates an oversupply of unskilled labor in the industries of the country as a whole, a condition which demands legislation restricting the further admission of such unskilled labor.

I want to impress that phrase "unskilled labor" upon the minds of Senators, and I propose before I shall have concluded my remarks to give ample reasons for this recommendation. The commission adds:

> It is desirable in making the restriction that—
> (a) A sufficient number be debarred to produce a marked effect upon the present supply of unskilled labor.
> (b) As far as possible, the aliens excluded should be those who come to this country with no intention to become American citizens or even to maintain a permanent residence here, but merely to save enough by the adoption, if necessary, of low standards of living to return permanently to their home country. Such persons are usually men unaccompanied by wives or children.
> (c) As far as possible, the aliens excluded should also be those who by reason of their personal qualities or habits would least readily be assimilated or would make the least desirable citizens.

The commission then proceeds as follows:

> The following methods of restricting immigration have been suggested:
> (a) The exclusion of those unable to read or write in some language.
> (b) The limitation of the number of each race arriving each year to a certain percentage of the average of that race arriving during a given period of years.
> (c) The exclusion of unskilled laborers unaccompanied by wives or families.
> (d) The limitation of the number of immigrants arriving annually at any port.
> (e) The material increase in the amount of money required to be in the possession of the immigrant at the port of arrival.
> (f) The material increase of the head tax.
> (g) The levy of the head tax so as to make a marked discrimination in favor of men with families.

Then the commission say:

> All these methods would be effective in one way or another in securing restrictions in a greater or less degree. A majority of the commission favor the reading and writing test as the most feasible single method of restricting undesirable immigration.
> The commission as a whole recommends restriction—

I want to emphasize that fact—that every member of that commission recommended restriction.

> The commission as a whole recommends restriction as demanded by economic, moral, and social considerations, furnishes in its report reasons for such restriction, and points out methods by which Congress can attain the desired result if its judgment coincides with that of the commission.

It is an open secret that of the nine members of that commission there was only one who declined to join in recommending the adoption of the reading test as the most feasible single method of securing restriction of immigration of the character set forth in their report.

Now, in order to determine——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

Mr. REED. If it would not disturb the course of the Senator's remarks, I call his attention to the fact that he stated in the early part of his address that it was desirable to exclude immigrants from certain countries. I am interested in knowing, in order that I may follow the course of the Senator's logic, what races and countries he alluded to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. To whom this test should apply?

Mr. REED. No; whom it was desirable to exclude.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No race or country.

Mr. REED. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I did not say that. At least, I did not intend to say it.

Mr. REED. Then I misunderstood the Senator; and, of course, if I misunderstood him——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; I stated that certain streams of immigration that have been going to particular sections of this country where labor is overcrowded would be more particularly affected by this test than other streams of immigration.

Mr. REED. While that is not what I understood the Senator to say, and I probably misunderstood him, we understand now the Senator meant to say just what he is now saying.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Precisely.

Mr. REED. Now, what streams of immigration does the Senator refer to? Will he make that a little more definite?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will bear with me, I will take up that whole question and discuss the different streams of immigration, of what nationalities they consist, where they have gone, how they are employed, the conditions under which they are living, and how the reading test would affect them. It will take me some time to do it, but if the Senator will have patience with me, I will proceed.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

THE OLD AND THE NEW TYPES OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In order to understand the basis of such recommendation we must follow these streams, note their course, and measure their volume. In doing this we want to remember one remarkable fact, because we have had two types of immigration in this country—what the commission terms the old type of immigration and also what they term the new type. Down to 1882, 87 per cent of all European immigration coming into the United States came from western and northern Europe—England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, France, the Scandinavian States, and Belgium. Eighty-seven per cent down to the time when we first adopted legislation upon this subject came from that section, and only 13 per cent of the whole came from other sections of Europe. Yet we find 25 years later that this 87 per cent coming from northern and western Europe had been reduced to 20 per cent, so that 80 per cent of the entire immigration was coming from other sections of Europe; very largely from eastern and southern Europe.

Prior to the Civil War we had received about 5,000,000 aliens and they became thoroughly assimilated under the fusing heat of that contest. From 1860 to 1882, when we adopted our first legislation upon this subject, we had received something over 6,000,000 aliens, very largely, probably 80 per cent, from northern and western Europe. Since 1882 we have received 21,000,000 aliens into this country, making in the whole more than 32,000,000 who have come since the foundation of the Government, and 27,000,000 have been admitted since the beginning of the Civil War. This number becomes impressive when you remember that at that time the population of the United States was only 31,000,000.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator tell us whether those are the figures showing the net increase of aliens——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They represent the number of aliens admitted.

Mr. REED. Or the gross immigration.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They do not take into consideration those who have returned.

Mr. REED. What period of time does the Senator cover with those figures?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The last statement I made was that about 27,000,000 have come since 1860.

Mr. REED. Up to the present time?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. REED. At least one-half of those people are dead by this time.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Of course many of them are dead.

Mr. REED. Could the Senator give us the aggregate of the people of the United States who have died during that time so that we can get a proper comparison?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am unable to give those statistics. I do not know whether they are available or not.

Mr. REED. The point I am making, and I just want to make it plain, is this: It is absolutely unfair to take the total number of immigrants who have come to a country in a half century of time and compare that total of all who came in a half century of time with the fixed population in a given period, because you are comparing the living and the dead of the immigrants with only the living population of the country.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have made no such statement as that. I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Missouri that the statistics show that substantially one-third of the immigrants admitted return to the Old World.

THE OLD IMMIGRATION.

The immigration of 1860–1882, and known as the old immigration, came mostly from England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Germany, France, Scandinavia, and Belgium. It went almost wholly to the great Central West, to take advantage of the opportunities afforded by the homestead act which was adopted during the Civil War. During the period between 1860 and 1910 the number of farms in this country increased from 2,500,000 to 6,000,000, and we are told that the agricultural area thus opened up is as great as the whole area of Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Norway, Sweden, Austria, Switzerland, Portugal, and the Netherlands all combined. In the homestead act there was an invitation to men to come not only from the East and the West, but from Europe as well, to come with their families to take up these lands and to establish homes. The immigration of that period consisted almost wholly of homemakers who quickly became assimilated, who made splendid citizens, and who have added greatly to the progress of the Nation.

The system of railroad construction in the United States entered upon during the Civil War, and which has come to be the greatest system ever developed in any country, also served to attract them. Substantially one-seventh of the entire national wealth has been invested in the construction and equipment of the railroads of the country. In mileage they exceed all the railroads of Europe. These men helped us in this vast development, as they have helped us to establish the vast trade now existing between the States.

Of the immigration of that period, 75 per cent came from the countries I have named, and it proceeded to the sections I have indicated. I have in my hand a table from which it appears that between 1850 and 1860, 52 per cent of such immigration went to the Central West; from 1860 to 1870, 55¼ per cent went there; from 1870 to 1880, 56 per cent went there, and only 27 per cent went to the Atlantic States.

THE NEW IMMIGRATION.

During the decade from 1880 to 1890 the type of immigration changed; only 46⅝ per cent went to the Central West, while 43⅛ per cent went to the Atlantic States. From 1890 to 1900 the change was still more marked; only 12⅝ per cent went to the Central States, while 80⅝ per cent went to the Atlantic States. This change in the distribution of the immigrant masses was indicative of the change in its character, as well as the change in the industrial conditions of the country which induced them to come in such largely increased numbers.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit one question there?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Did not the movement of the American-born citizen to the cities correspond almost exactly in proportion with the increase of the foreigners in the cities? In other words, was there any greater movement of the foreigner to the cities than there was of the American-born citizen to the cities?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think there has been an altogether greater movement in that direction by the foreign element.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator know that in those States that are peculiarly American, as that term is ordinarily applied, there has been a constant increase in the city population, that there has been a constant decrease of the farm population, that the influx of foreigners into the cities has not been any greater in proportion than has been the influx of Americans, and that that movement of both foreigners and Americans from the farm to the city has been purely an economic movement?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is undoubtedly true that there has been an increase in the population of the cities of the world as commerce has increased and as industries have been established, but I think I shall be able to show that the conditions which have induced the very large immigration of recent years have sprung from the great industries located in the cities of the North; that the current of immigration has been toward the seats of the great basic industries, and that the type of this new immigration differs from the old in that it has sought employment in our manufactures rather than in tilling the soil.

INCREASED DEMAND FOR LABOR IN UNITED STATES.

To understand this movement we have only to remember that in 1860 the value of our manufactured products annually was only $2,000,000,000, but that in 1910 such products amounted to $20,000,000,000. During the intervening period the products of our mills not only became equal to those of France or of Great Britain or of Germany as individual nations, but we passed them, as Bismarck had prophesied we would do, at a gallop. To-day the products of our mills are greater in value than the combined manufactured products of England, Germany, and France. It is because of the marvelous growth of these industries in the United States that the immigration of recent years has occurred. It represents races entirely different in stock from ours and conditions so entirely different that we can hardly comprehend them. It comes largely from Russia, Austria-Hungary, the Balkan States, and Italy, especially south Italy, in which nations conditions are below those in western and northern Europe and vastly below those existing in the United States.

Mr. LODGE. As, for instance, Syria and Armenia.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; I have omitted the Syrians and Armenians, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests. Consider conditions in south Italy, from which we have received such vast numbers. When the commission was there in 1907 it appeared that the average wage paid to agricultural laborers had been 25 cents a day until the emigration from Italy to the United States had been so great in volume that the price of labor had been so enhanced that at that time the price paid was 40 cents a day, although they did not include the keep of the laborer.

What was true in southern Italy has been true in Austria; it has been true in Hungary; it has been true in Russia. The wages are far lower in those countries than in Great Britain, and lower than they are in Germany, although German wages are not high. It is because of the low wages paid in these countries and consequent low living conditions, and a knowledge of the better conditions and the larger opportunities afforded working men in America, that such large numbers have been seeking our shores.

CONDITIONS IN EUROPE WHICH ENCOURAGE EMIGRATION.

In its report, volume 1, page 186, the commission discusses the causes which induce emigration from European countries. I ask permission to insert an extract from the commission's report upon that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The purely economic condition of the wageworker is generally very much lower in Europe than in the United States. This is especially true of the unskilled-laborer class from which so great a proportion of the emigration to the United States is drawn. Skilled labor also is poorly paid when compared with returns for like service in the United States, but the opportunity for continual employment in this field is usually good and the wages sufficiently high to lessen the incentive to emigration. A large proportion of the emigration from southern and eastern Europe may be traced directly to the inability of the peasantry to gain an adequate livelihood in agricultural pursuits either as laborers or proprietors. Agricultural labor is paid extremely low wages, and employment is quite likely to be seasonal rather than continuous. In cases where peasant proprietorship is possible the land holdings are usually so small, the methods of cultivation so primitive, and the taxes so high that even in productive years the struggle for existence is a hard one, while a crop failure means practical disaster for the small farmer and farm laborer alike. In agrarian Russia, where the people have not learned to emigrate, a crop failure results in a famine, while in other sections of southern and eastern Europe it results in emigration, usually to the United States. Periods of industrial depression, as well as crop failures, stimulate emigration, but the effect of the former is not so pronounced, for the reason that disturbed financial and industrial conditions in Europe are usually coincidental with like conditions in the United States, and at such times the emigration movement is always relatively smaller.

The fragmentary nature of available data relative to wages in many European countries makes a satisfactory comparison with wages in the United States impossible. It is well known, however, that even in England, Germany, France, and other countries of western Europe wages are below the United States standard, while in southern and eastern Europe the difference is very great. The commission found this to be true in its investigations in parts of Italy, Austria-Hungary, Greece, Turkey, Russia, and the Balkan States. In fact, it may safely be stated that in these countries the average wage of men engaged in common and agricultural labor is less than 50 cents per day, while in some sections it is even much lower. It is true that in some countries agricultural laborers receive from employers certain concessions in the way of fuel, food, etc., but in cases of this nature which came to the attention of the commission the value of the concessions was insufficient to materially affect the low wage scale.

It is a common but erroneous belief that peasants and artisans in the European countries from which the new immigrant comes can live so very cheaply that the low wages have practically as great a purchasing power as the higher wages in the United States. The low cost of living among the working people, especially of southern and eastern Europe, is due to a low standard of living rather than to the cheapness of food and other commodities. As a matter of fact, meat and other costly articles of food, which are considered as almost essential to the everyday table of the American workingman, can not be afforded among laborers in like occupations in southern and eastern Europe. The same is true of the American standard of housing, clothing, and other things which enter into the cost of living.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if I do not interrupt the Senator from Vermont to his inconvenience, at this very point might I ask him for information—first assuring him that certain people for whom I speak assert that the commission to which the Senator alludes and from whose report he draws his extracts, was made up of membership wholly excluding any person whomsoever having knowledge of, much less bearing any racial relation to, the people whom they now ask to have excluded, and for that reason those people living in the city from whence I come and the State which I represent with my colleague, contend that this very commission on which the able Senator now descants, is partial as against them, for that they were allowed neither voice, hearing, nor representation—will the Senator at some time in the course of his remarks, when it does not divert him from a regular arrangement, address himself to that point, so that I may have his views on it?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I am not quite sure that I comprehend the inquiry of the Senator, but I will say that the Immigration Commission as constituted was made up of three Senators, three Representatives, and three gentlemen from civil life, appointed by the President. From the Senate there were five different Members at various times, one or two having died. Of the three gentlemen who came from civil life one was Mr. William R. Wheeler, of California; another was Prof. Jenks, of Cornell University; and the third was Dr. Neill, who was Commissioner of Labor and who was from Texas.

The people from Chicago who were referred to, were heard by the commission, and investigations were made, as will appear further on in my remarks, of the industries in Chicago and in all parts of the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to inquire whether or not, according to his information, wages have been increased since the data which the Senator is to insert in this part of his remarks were compiled by the commission? Does the Senator know whether in recent years, since those data were compiled, wages have advanced in those countries to which the data apply?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not know to what extent wages have advanced. I know that in Italy we found farm labor had advanced from 25 cents to 40 cents a day during the 10 or 15 years in which we received such a vast volume of immigrants from that country. Beyond that I am unable to state.

Mr. FLETCHER. Can the Senator give us the date when those tables were prepared?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They were prepared in 1907.

Mr. FLETCHER. One further question in that connection. I desire to ask whether the Senator is advised as to the cost of living in those countries since then—whether or not the price of food products has gone up? That might have some bearing on the question of wages in those countries.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think that the prices of commodities have advanced to a certain extent throughout the world, but not uniformly by any means.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wanted to bring that information, if I could, down to date.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I should be glad to have any statement the Senator has in his possession.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no statement, only a memorandum given me while in France last August, showing that the wages paid farm hands in France were from 40 to 60 cents a day with board, or 60 to 80 cents a day without board. Then there are other schedules of wages. I do not know that it is very material in this connection; but inasmuch as the Senator was putting into the RECORD the data furnished by the commission in 1907 as to wages in certain foreign countries, I thought it would be better to bring the information down to date, if it could be done, showing the changes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I have stated that wages in western Europe were higher than they were in eastern Europe. It has been stated by writers on economics that you may trace the history of free institutions by the rate of wages paid in a country, and we know that in Great Britain, in Germany, in France, and in western Europe generally institutions are much more free than they are in eastern and southern Europe. I have no doubt that wages in France are higher than they are in the section which I was mentioning.

BEST OF PEASANT CLASS COME.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that the Immigration Commission did not recommend the exclusion of any particular race or nationality, but they recommended the adoption of the literacy test in the hope that it would limit to some extent certain streams of immigration which had been admitted in such volume that the market for common or unskilled labor in the United States was found to be overcrowded to such a degree that immigrants of this class were competing against themselves. The commission had no prejudice against any one of the nations that have been mentioned or against their people. The immigration from those countries is largely of the peasant class; and we undoubtedly get the best of that class, because only those come who have a desire to better their conditions and with that desire enterprise enough to scrape together the money necessary for the outlay, and courage enough to assume the responsibility of the change.

GOOD PHYSICAL CONDITION—HOW SECURED.

Not only that, but the immigrants are as a rule a good class from a physical standpoint.

Our laws against the admission of diseased persons are broad and comprehensive, and they are rigidly enforced. Among the classes excluded are idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, paupers, persons likely to become a public charge, professional beggars, persons afflicted with tuberculosis or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, persons not comprehended within any of the foregoing excluded classes who are found to be and are certified by the examining surgeon as being mentally or physically defective, such mental or physical defect being of a nature which may affect the ability of such alien to earn a living, persons who have been convicted of committing a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, polygamists, anarchists, prostitutes, women or girls coming into the United States for the purposes of prostitution, and so forth.

These provisions of the law are not only enforced at our ports, but a medical examination of every proposed emigrant is required at all ports of embarkation in foreign nations. Under that law we say to the steamship companies: "If you bring to this country an idiot or an imbecile, or an insane person, or one who has epilepsy or who has tuberculosis, or who has a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, whose condition might have been discovered by a competent medical examination at the port of embarkation, we will impose a fine upon you of $100"—$200 I think it is now—"and compel you to transport that person back to the country whence he came." That provision of the law has relieved the officers at our ports very largely of the burden which they formerly bore, as it has greatly reduced the number of the defective classes presenting themselves for admission. The result has been that the steamship companies, at their own expense, have employed surgeons to examine with reference to all of these diseases every person who offers himself or herself as an intended immigrant to the United States.

As a consequence, so many were discarded at the ports of Germany that they became a burden upon the cities where such examinations were held. The German Government then compelled the steamship companies to establish what they call "control stations" all along the borders of Germany, at which every intended immigrant to the United States coming from Russia or from Austria or from Hungary or from Italy to a German port to take ship is compelled to be examined at the expense of the steamship company. If the immigrant is unable to pass this medical examination, he is sent back to the country whence he came and does not become a burden to Germany. So that all those coming from foreign ports are examined abroad, and those coming from Germany are twice examined. As a result of such examinations, nearly 40,000 intended immigrants were rejected at foreign ports during the year 1907, and our officers were saved from the necessity of sending them back upon their arrival at an American port. To be accurate, during the 13 months to December 31, 1907, there were rejected at ports of embarkation 27,799; at the control station which I have mentioned, 11,882; making in all 39,681. During the same period there were rejected at our own ports about 13,000, making in all something over 52,000 who were rejected because of physical or mental defects. So that, with such examinations as I have indicated, the immigrants who are admitted to this country as a whole are a splendid body of people from a physical standpoint.

In addition to that they are, from the standpoint of age when admitted, a most desirable class. Ninety-five per cent of them were under 45 years of age. Substantially 83 per cent of them were between 14 and 45 years of age. In other words, the great proportion of them were admitted at a time in life when they were capable of maintaining themselves.

NOT HOMEMAKERS—PREPONDERANCE OF MALES.

There are, however, some characteristics connected with the immigration from eastern and southern Europe which must not be disregarded, and I can not do better, perhaps, than to direct the Senate's attention specifically to some of the races and nationalities which contribute most largely to the "new immigration," as it is called. During the period of 15 years, 1899–1913, we admitted nearly 8,000,000 immigrants of the following races, named in order according to the relative importance of each in the numbers admitted: South Italians, Hebrews, Polish, North Italians, Slovaks, Croatians, Slovenians, Hungarians, Greeks, Lithuanians, and Ruthenians. Out of that entire number, 66 per cent are Italians, Hebrews, and Polish. The significant feature of this immigration is that 73 per cent of the whole were males.

Have they come here to make homes? Have they brought their families, as did the immigration from northern and western Europe?

I have before me another table showing the percentage of males among the aliens coming in the years 1899 to 1910, for the 10 leading races, from which the same startling fact appears. Of the South Italians, Hebrews, Polish, Slovaks, North Italians, Hungarians, Croatians, Slovenians, Greeks, Lithuanians, and Ruthenians, furnishing a total immigration of 5,989,000, 73 per cent were males.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. We do not get from the description of all those classes and where they come from an idea as to where the Hebrews come from. The Senator says "South Italians, Poles, and Hebrews" without specifying from where the Hebrews come.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They come from all sections, but very largely from Russia and from Austria.

I will say that of these different nationalities 78 per cent of the South Italians were males. Only 56 per cent of the Hebrews were males. On the other hand, of the Polish 69 per cent were males; of the Slovaks, 70 per cent; of the North Italians, 78 per cent; of the Hungarians, 72 per cent; and of the other races even a larger percentage.

MOSTLY COMMON LABORERS.

Another significant factor in the problem lies in the fact that while this new immigration is made up so largely of males, it consists almost wholly of common or unskilled laborers. In volume 1, page 121, of the commission's report, a table will be found which shows that common or farm laborers, or those without occupation, received during the 12 years from 1899 to 1910 constituted the following proportions of the immigration by races in that period:

South Italians, 85.4 per cent; Hebrews, 32.9 per cent; Polish, 93.7 per cent; Slovaks, 95.6 per cent; north Italians, 79.6 per cent; Hungarians, 91.4 per cent; Croatians and Slovenians, 95 per cent; Greeks, 92.3 per cent; Lithuanians, 93.3 per cent; Ruthenians, 79.5 per cent. Of the Bulgarians, Servians, and Montenegrins, 96.7 per cent of them belong to those classes; of the Finnish, 94 per cent; of the Roumanians, 97.3 per cent; and of the Portuguese, 93 per cent. So it appears that the males making up this immigration were almost wholly common or farm laborers in the countries from whence they come. You would naturally think, therefore, that they would go to the farms in this country. But have they done so? I regret to say that they have not.

I was interested in what the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] said this morning about the area of our land and the opportunity there is for this class of immigrants to find places upon the soil; but the fact is that the new immigration does not go to the soil. It proceeds almost wholly and directly to the cities. From the year 1880 to 1909, a period of 30 years—and I might say that this will be an answer to an inquiry that was made in the debate this morning by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]—we received from Austria-Hungary, in round numbers, 2,850,000 immigrants; from Italy, 2,801,000; from Russia, 2,134,000; in all, 7,785,000 immigrants. That was in the period of 30 years. Now, the census of 1910 reveals the most remarkable fact that of that entire number less than 1 per cent were found in that year to be managers of farms in this country, either as owners or as tenants. To be exact, only nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the entire immigration from those countries, covering a period of 30 years, was found managing farms in this country, either as owners or as tenants.

INCREASE AND DECREASE OF DIFFERENT RACES IN THE UNITED STATES.

The census also shows that during the last 10 census years there was an absolute decrease in the residents of this country who had their birth in northern and western Europe. Of those born in Great Britain, Germany, Scandinavia, the Netherlands, Belgium, Switzerland, Ireland, and France there was an absolute decrease of almost 4 per cent—to be accurate, 3.9 per cent—in this country; while, on the other hand, there was an increase of 175.5 per cent in the residents of this country who had come from Portugal, Spain, Italy, Russia, Finland, Austria-Hungary, Roumania, Servia, Montenegro, Bulgaria, and Greece.

The percentage of increase in the population of this country among certain races is shown in the fact that those from Greece have increased during the 10 census years 1,000 per cent, those from Italy 177.5 per cent, those coming from Russia and Finland 170.4 per cent, and from Austria-Hungary 162.3 per cent.

I call attention to these facts to show the trend of the modern immigration, how different it is from the old immigration, and I propose as I proceed to show where they have gone and how they are employed.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator if he has the figures showing the proportion of Italian immigrants from north Italy and from south Italy, respectively?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not it at my command at this moment, but the immigration from south Italy is vastly greater than that from north Italy and differs in character in every way. It differs in racial origin and in instincts and in business habits. I suppose 56 per cent of the southern Italians are illiterate, while probably not more than 4 or 5 per cent of the northern Italians are illiterate, and yet the same law governs both sections of the country. The two classes differ in origin, in education, mental characteristics, and in occupation.

NEW IMMIGRATION FOUND MOSTLY IN CITIES.

Now, as to the trend of the people who have come to this country: I am speaking still from the census reports. I find that of the more than a million Italians found in this country when the last census was taken, 78 per cent were in the cities.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It seems to me this may be very readily accounted for by the fact that the cities, with their great manufacturing industries, must necessarily offer better and larger wages than the agricultural regions can offer.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Senator is undoubtedly right, and that is just the point I am making—that these people come over and go to the cities, where the manufactories are located, where the sewers are to be installed, where the street railroads are to be constructed. They flow directly toward the great centers of industry.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have held, and still hold—I want to say just what I feel—that the iniquities of the high protective system have overstimulated manufacturing industries to a degree that has drawn from the rural population so largely that agriculture has languished, to our detriment—hence the high price of foodstuffs—and our cities have been flooded and overpopulated. Now, I realize the importance and necessity of an immigration bill; I want to vote for an immigration bill; but I am so utterly and totally opposed to the so-called literacy test that if it must remain in the bill, I shall have, very much to my regret, to vote against the whole measure.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Before I conclude, Mr. President, I shall show the ground upon which the commission recommended that test and the facts upon which it based its opinion when that action was taken. Then, of course, the Senator will act upon his judgment.

Returning to the subject of aliens in the cities. Of the Russians in this country, 87 per cent were found to be denizens of the cities, while of those from Austria-Hungary the proportion was 75 per cent; of those from Roumania, 92 per cent; of the Turks, 83 per cent. Of the immigration during the four years immediately preceding the census of 1910, 78.5 per cent of the whole number admitted proceeded directly to the cities. Think of that! Almost eight-tenths of the whole went directly to the centers of population.

I have already commented upon the fact that a very large proportion of these adult men were common or farm laborers in the countries from which they came. Over 70 per cent, probably nearer 75 per cent of them, came from southeastern Europe, and 82 per cent of them went to New England, the Atlantic, and east-north-central States.

I wish you would consider that statement for a moment. New England, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan constitute only about 13 per cent of the area of continental United States, and yet it appears that over 80 per cent of this entire immigration found its destination in that area; and that is where they are found to-day—in the large manufacturing towns of that large manufacturing section of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. REED. Assume that they were not there. It follows, does it not, that if these foreigners were not there, working, the mills would have to shut down or employ somebody else, some natives? You would then have exactly the same degree of congestion in the cities that you now have, so far as numbers are concerned.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; I think not.

Mr. REED. Why not?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. We want them there. We welcome immigration. We welcome these races. I have nothing against any one of these races. I am not criticizing them. We want them in sufficient numbers to supply the demand for labor, but under conditions that will enable them to live upon an American basis; but they have come there in such numbers, as our investigation showed, that they are living under conditions that are un-American and absolutely undesirable. They are unable to secure employment a sufficient portion of the time to enable them to live under conditions that we like to have American laborers enjoy. I am coming to that subject a little later on.

Mr. REED. I am addressing myself only to the question of congestion in cities for the present. I can not discuss half a dozen questions at once.

Manifestly, if these people come from Europe, go into New England, and gain employment in the mills, that means the addition of a certain number of people to that population. It also follows that if these men were not working there, and nobody came to take their places, the mills would close. It also follows that if others did come to take their places you would have exactly the same amount of congestion.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Provided the same number came.

Mr. REED. Now, is it not true that the mills of all New England have been complaining for years that the reason why they can not compete is because they have to pay wages that they claim are too high?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I never heard that.

Mr. REED. Well, is it not true?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. What we claim is, having to pay American wages, that we should have protection as against European labor.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes. Still, you either do pay American wages or you do not. If you have not been paying American wages, then you ought not to have been clamoring for protection. If you have been paying American wages, then these foreigners are collecting American wages and have the ability to live the same as American citizens live.

It seems to me one of those arguments eats up the other. I do not know which it is.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether the lowest American wages paid are not higher than the laborers receiving wages abroad would get?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the wages paid to these classes—and they were vastly too low—were at least three times as great as the wages they received in the countries from which they came.

Mr. REED. Let me ask one further question: Who fixes the wages of these classes and puts them at a beggarly stipend? Is it the foreign laborer or is it the American employer?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They are fixed by the conditions in each particular locality. Of course they are fixed by the employer, except where it becomes a matter of agreement, as it is in most cases in Vermont, between the employer and organized labor.

THE IMMIGRANT IN THE INDUSTRIES.

It is probable, Mr. President, that from 80 to 90 per cent of all the wages paid in the manufacturing industries of the United States are paid in the States to which I have alluded, and very naturally the immigration coming here to get employment goes where employment is to be had. There is no question but that the employers delight in having on hand a larger force of labor than can be employed at all times, that the supply may be ample in time of unusual activity; but the commission found that immigrants of the new class had come in such excessive numbers that out of kindness to the laborers themselves others of their class should be discouraged from coming.

The commission, in order to investigate the condition of aliens in American industries, sent out their agents and caused to be examined 37 of the leading industries in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains. In doing so they came in contact with 700,000 different employees in the different industries. They made 23,000 family studies, apportioning them among the different classes of industries, and they went into 200 industrial communities to study conditions there. They found that of that 700,000 employees with whom they came in contact 59.9 per cent—call it 60 per cent—of the whole were born abroad, that 15 per cent were their children, and that less than 20 per cent were the sons or the daughters of American-born parents.

In the iron and steel industry they found 57.7 per cent foreign born; in the slaughtering and meat-packing industry, 60.7 per cent; in wool and worsted manufacturing, 61.9 per cent; in the coal industry, 61.9 per cent; in the copper mining and smelting industry, 65.3 per cent; in the leather tanning, currying, and finishing industry, 67 per cent; in cotton-goods manufactures, 68.7 per cent; in clothing manufactures, 72.2 per cent; in silk-goods manufactures, 75.1 per cent, or an average of 65.6 per cent of foreign-born employees in these industries.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will inquire of the Senator whether he has a showing of the percentage of those he has been mentioning who became citizens?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am coming to that later, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would have an important bearing to show what per cent of them have become American citizens, registered voters who have become a part of the Government.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have tables bearing upon that subject, but they are farther along in my notes. I will refer to them a little later. I want to say, however, that of the old immigration about three times as many proportionally became citizens as those of the new.

OVERCROWDED CONDITIONS.

That the new immigration has overcrowded the industries in the country is shown by the results of the investigation of the commission, perhaps more so in the iron and steel industry than in any other. In their investigations our agents came in contact with 86,000 employees of the iron and steel industry, and of these 57.7 per cent were foreign born, 13.4 per cent were their sons, constituting 71.4 per cent of the whole. Eighty-eight per cent of all this vast army of employees came from southern and eastern Europe and represented the new immigration. Yet out of that whole number working in the iron and steel industry only 8.6 per cent—less than 9 per cent—ever had any previous experience in it, and 65 per cent of them had been common laborers in the countries from which they came.

It was found in that investigation that the weekly wages paid to these people as a class were, upon an average, $14.35. Had they been employed full time, they would have received $750 a year; but, as a matter of fact, the annual average earnings of the 86,000 employees so interviewed amounted to only $326, or about one-half what they should have earned had they had work during the entire year. As a matter of fact, the industry was so overcrowded with applicants for common unskilled labor that those employed had worked only about one-half the time.

The great body of these laborers are single men, but there were some families among them, and of such families less than 8 per cent were supported by the husband and the children; the balance eked out their income by taking roomers or boarders. Forty-one per cent of them were found to be taking boarders.

The conditions were worse in the iron and steel industry than in any other examined. I will not weary the Senate by going through each one of them separately, but will content myself by saying that in the bituminous-coal industry, silk manufacturing, and the woolen industry it was found that the men had work only two-thirds of the time; in leather, clothing, and oil refining, three-fourths of the time; and in cotton, sugar refining, boots and shoes, and some others, about four-fifths of the time; but we found that everywhere among all the industries of our country there was a greater supply of common unskilled labor than was demanded by the ordinary business of the industries.

LEAST DESIRABLE CLASSES.

In their recommendations to Congress the commission says that if we are to reduce any of these streams of immigration, the individuals of which are competing against each other, we should select those that are the least desirable.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has just requested information as to the number among the different classes who have become naturalized citizens of the United States. From the census of 1910 it appears that of the races constituting the old immigration the following had become naturalized or had taken out first papers: Of the Germans, 76.7 per cent; of the English, 66.3 per cent; of the Irish, 73.6 per cent; of the Welsh, 73.7 per cent; of the Swedish, 64.7 per cent; of the Norwegians, 72.3 per cent; of the Danes, 74.2 per cent; of the Swiss, 71.3 per cent; and of the Hollanders, 67.5 per cent.

The number who had become naturalized or who had taken out first papers among the races of the new immigration appears from the following statement: Of the South Italians, only 30 per cent; of the Russian Hebrews, 57.2 per cent; of the other Hebrews, 61.6 per cent; of the Polish, 33 per cent; of the Slovaks, 22.8 per cent; of the North Italians, 45.8 per cent; of the Hungarians, 26.8 per cent; of the Croatians, 22.5 per cent; of the Slovenians, 35 per cent; of the Greeks, 20 per cent; of the Lithuanians, 32.5 per cent; and of the Ruthenians, 19.5 per cent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

Mr. REED. The Senator has given in these tables the percentage of immigrants who have become naturalized or have taken out their first papers and he has compared what he terms the old immigration with the new. Manifestly an old immigration—that is, an immigration which reached its climax some years ago—can not be justly compared with an immigration which has just reached its climax at this time, because the old immigrant has been here more years upon the average, has had the greater opportunity to become naturalized, whereas the man who has just arrived has had substantially no opportunity at all. Does the Senator think that a comparison of recent immigration with old immigration is a proper test as to the intention of people who have recently come to become American citizens?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. There is very much force in the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri, but the Senator will remember that the figures I am giving are taken from the census of those in the United States in 1910, and that this new immigration has been coming since 1882 in increasing numbers. Of course those who have come more recently have not had the same opportunity to become citizens as the others. I have no doubt the Senator is right to a certain extent, but, on the other hand, we have been receiving of the old type immigration substantially one-third of our immigration all this time, and it is just about in the proportion of one-third of the old type and two-thirds of the new type. So we have a very large number from northern and western Europe, who have come recently, as well as from eastern and southern Europe.

Mr. REED. But, nevertheless, to take an example, if there were an aggregate of 10,000,000 foreign-born people in the United States, and if the first 5,000,000 of those people had come from England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, and four-fifths of that 5,000,000 had been here for 10 years on the average, whereas four-fifths of the other 5,000,000 who came from the other parts of Europe had been here only 2 or 3 years, in endeavoring to ascertain the intention of these people to become American citizens by the test as to the number who had made application for citizenship, the comparison could not be fairly made between the recent immigrant and the one who had been here for many years, speaking on the average.

I want to ask the Senator this question, because it is very pertinent: Does the Senator think that the foreigner who comes here is the more desirable who takes out naturalization papers, or does he think that the one who does not become a citizen is the more desirable?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I think that the man who comes here and brings his family, who comes here for the purpose of casting his lot with us and becoming an American citizen, sharing in our privileges, and assuming his burden of responsibility, is the desirable citizen, and he is the man who naturally takes out his naturalization papers.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator must believe that the addition of the foreign voter to our electorate is a benefit to this country. What, then, becomes of the cry abroad in this land that the foreigner is seizing the Government and running it and therefore is an undesirable citizen?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, in answer to what the Senator from Missouri has said, I think the desirable man to have come to this country is the man who wants to become a citizen of the country. A certain proportion of them may not make desirable citizens; we have a great many American born who are not desirable citizens, but I think that the most desirable immigrant who comes here is the man who comes with the idea of permanency, in the hope and expectation of improving his condition and giving his children the opportunity which this country affords, and he is the man who as a rule takes steps to become a citizen of the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If I may interrupt the Senator, I would like to ask him if he has any statistics as to the percentage of those who returned to the country from which they came?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Taking it year by year, substantially one-third of all who come to this country return to the country from whence they came, and a larger proportion of the new immigration return than of the old immigration.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the average time of their residence here?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am unable to state it. That depends very much upon conditions existing in this country. The very large proportion of our immigrants are wage earners and are leading single lives. I will show you a little later their movements are determined by the industrial conditions in this country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As I take it, they are undesirable persons for one reason, and that is that they come here and what they accumulate here they take back home with them.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Very largely.

Mr. VARDAMAN. They make no investments here. They do not become a part of the Government.

Mr. REED. In the interest of accuracy I would just like to interrupt the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I shall be very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. REED. Are not the figures which show the net increase of foreign immigration made up in this way: All who come here are counted as immigrants the first time they come in, and all who return to Europe are counted as having left this country and are deducted from the total coming in?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. What figures does the Senator refer to?

Mr. REED. Those the Senator was himself just referring to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was giving the results shown by the census of the foreign-born in this country.

Mr. REED. The question was asked by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] what proportion of these immigrants return to Europe, and the Senator said in reply substantially one-third. What I am inquiring about is whether our immigration authorities do not charge up as returning to Europe every man who comes here and who has not become naturalized, even though he may be returning to Europe for only a few months or a few weeks.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think not.

Mr. REED. When they return intending to come back.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that prior to 1907 the records were not accurately kept. The law did not require it and the best estimate we could make, having examined the question from all available sources, was that substantially one-third returned to the countries from which they came.

Mr. REED. Permanently returned?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Some permanently and some not; but they returned. Under the law of 1907 a record is kept. Unfortunately, I have not that record before me at this time; but a record is kept, showing those who are going abroad temporarily and those who are going permanently, and that record the Senator can secure from the Department of Labor.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). The Senator from Delaware suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Nelson	Shields
Borah	Gallinger	Newlands	Simmons
Brady	Goff	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Gore	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Gronna	Overman	Smoot
Bryan	Hardwick	Page	Sterling
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kern	Pomerene	Swanson
Clapp	Lane	Ransdell	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Reed	Thornton
Culberson	Lewis	Robinson	Vardaman
Cummins	Lippitt	Saulsbury	White
Dillingham	McCumber	Shafroth	Williams
du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the fact that my colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is absent on important public business and that he is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the city on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

NOT HOME MAKERS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, when interrupted I had been speaking of the proportion of the recent immigrants who have become citizens or who have taken out their first papers as one of the elements which enter into the question of their desirability as citizens, but as further showing that the new immigration to a very large extent has not come here for the purpose of establishing homes and becoming members of the great American family I want to call attention to the fact that between 1899 and 1910, a period of 12 years, of all those admitted 69.5 per cent were males and only 30.5 per cent were females. Taking them by nationalities, the proportion of males in the immigration from south Italy was 78.6 per cent; Hebrews, 56.6 per cent; Polish, 69.5; Slovaks, 70.5 per cent; North Italians, 78.3; Hungarians, 72.2; Croatians, 84.9 per cent; Slovenians, 70.5; of the Greeks, 95.1; and Lithuanians, 70.6 per cent, from which it appears that of the nationalities, the races, to which I last referred substantially from 70 to 80 per cent, upon an average, were males, and they constitute a large element in the immigration of those 12 years.

Returning to the commission's investigation of the industries in the United States, the following startling conditions are disclosed: Of the wage earners in the manufactories of America, it was found that 55 per cent of them were married men, but that three-fourths of all the married men had left their wives in Europe, and substantially 86 per cent of all the men engaged in the manufactures of the United States were leading single lives, without any of those home influences which everybody in America recognizes as being so essential to good citizenship. They were living in colonies in the cities and under conditions which were undesirable and un-American, leading lives that ought not to be led in a country that is self-governing, as is the United States.

DANGER TO OUR POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS.

In this connection I direct the attention of the Senate to another startling condition disclosed by the census of 1910, and I want to call it sharply to the attention of every thinking person, to all who are considering seriously the problem that confronts us, and to submit to them the question whether there should not be some measure of restriction to decrease the volume of the streams of immigration that are flowing toward the United States. We can not deny the fact, the census of 1900 shows it, that in that year there were in this country 900,000 aliens, men of 21 years and over, who had not at that time become citizens of the United States. The census of 1910 shows that instead of there being 900,000 of that class there were in the last-named year 2,260,000.

Now, mark the fact, every one of those men is liable to become a citizen of the United States within five years. They belong to the classes that may become naturalized if they so desire. What does it mean to our institutions to have in the United States, and very largely in that little strip of territory reaching from New England to the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio River, 2,260,000 of that class? You can not realize the significance of the situation without instituting comparisons.

POSSIBLE FUTURE CITIZENS.

I want to call the attention of the Senators from the Pacific and the Rocky Mountain States to the fact that in California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas there were cast for President of the United States at the last election 2,281,000 votes, and yet we had in 1910 in this country alien males over 21 years of age who had not taken the first step toward becoming naturalized citizens of the United States almost equal in number to the entire voting force of those 15 States.

Let me institute another comparison which will interest the gentlemen from the South. In Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, 12 States, the votes cast for President at the last election numbered only 1,922,740. Yet we have right here in the United States, as I have said, 2,260,000 men who are eligible to naturalization, but who had not in 1910 taken out their first papers, a number largely in excess of the entire presidential vote in those 12 States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator desire that those 2,000,000 unnaturalized people shall become naturalized?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not, unless they will bring their wives and their families with them. If they will bring their wives and their families with them, I do not care how quickly they are naturalized; the sooner the better.

Mr. REED. Then, it is solely the fact that they have not brought their wives or that they are not married on which the Senator bases his objection. Does the Senator think that a man who is unmarried is unfit for citizenship in this country?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Not at all, everything else being equal.

Mr. REED. I did not think the Senator would claim that. Is it not a fact that the men who come here, the recent immigrants who have left their wives at home, are simply duplicating what the Germans and the Irish and the Scotchmen did in the days of adversity for their countries when they came here?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think they did it.

Mr. REED. They left their wives at home until they could get money enough to send for them.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the Senator from Missouri will find that very few of them did that.

Mr. REED. Is it not a fact that these foreigners are every day bringing their families here just as rapidly as they can get the money to bring them? I do not know what the Senator's experience is, but there is hardly a day in my life which passes when there is not some trouble about getting in the child or the wife of some man who is here, and it takes a good deal of my time trying to assist them through the red tape that has been set up in the Immigration Bureau of the country.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri forgets the statement that I made, that out of the 700,000 employees in the manufactories of America with whom the commission came into contact three-fourths of the married men had left their wives in Europe.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I undertake to say that the Irish immigration to this country showed substantially the same condition. These people come here with barely enough money to get here; they can not bring their wives with them; but they send back and get them. The Senator from Vermont does not mean to charge these people with having abandoned their families?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If they would send for their wives and bring them here it would be well, but the majority of them do not do so. The Irish immigrants to whom the Senator from Missouri refers intended to bring their wives and the Germans and the English did the same.

Mr. REED. Exactly; and I contend that the people against whom the Senator is now inveighing intend to do the same thing; at least there is no evidence whatever to the contrary.

The Senator speaks of the agents of the Immigration Bureau having come in contact with six or seven hundred thousand people. Manifestly that must have been a very slight contact. It could not have been a real investigation of the homes of these people; that would have been physically impossible.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. We sent out agents and we used a card system, and I have told the Senator the number of homes which we investigated.

Mr. REED. How long had those people been here, on the average, who were here without their wives?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I can not give the Senator the exact time.

Mr. REED. Of course that is very pertinent if they had only been here a few months and had not earned enough money to bring them.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But you have to assume when an investigation covers 37 industries of the United States, and when a system has been growing with great rapidity since 1860 that the greater portion of the employees must have been here a considerable length of time.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, to show that this vast volume of eligibles to naturalization to which I have just referred, are more largely of the new immigration than of the old, let me again refer to the census of 1910. From this it appears that the proportions of the immigrants of the various races who had failed to take out first papers were as follows: Of the Germans, 9.9 per cent only had failed to take out papers; of the Irish, only 13.8 per cent; of the Canadians, 28.3 per cent; of the English, 18.8; of the Swedes, 14.9; of the Norwegians, 16.2 per cent; of those from Scotland, 21.5 per cent; of those from Denmark, 13.8 per cent; of those from Holland, 19.6 per cent; of those from France, 27.8 per cent; and of those from Wales, 10.3 per cent.

Among those representing the new immigration the percentage was much larger: Of the Russians, there were 52.4 per cent; from Italy, 65.7 per cent; from Austria, 57.3 per cent; from Hungary, 68.2; from Mexico, 66.6 per cent; from Greece, 77.6; from Finland, 45.9 per cent; from Portugal, 64.3 per cent; and from Roumania, 45.2 per cent.

It is apparent that the proportion of those not desiring citizenship is very much larger among those immigrants coming from eastern and southern Europe than those coming from western and northern Europe.

I find, by making another reference to the census, that out of the 3,075,000 of the old immigration in this country in 1910, only 12 per cent, or 370,000, have failed to take out first papers or to become naturalized; while of the new immigration, out of the 1,980,998, 55 per cent, or 1,301,000, had failed to take out such papers.

HOW WILL THE READING TEST APPLY.

How will the literacy test apply? What will it accomplish? What races will it most affect? This can best be ascertained by an examination of official records of the Department of Labor. These disclose the fact that in the 11 years from 1899 to 1909 we received of aliens over 14 years of age 7,197,060—of the old immigration 1,983,000, in round numbers, and of the new immigration 5,215,000. Of the old immigration there were only 2.7 per cent who were unable to read, of the new immigration there were 35.6 per cent who were unable to read. In that connection I want to say to the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] that I do not look upon this as necessarily a test of quality; I would not advocate its adoption upon that ground, although I would rather admit an educated rather than an uneducated person. If education was not desirable as an element of good citizenship, compulsory school laws would not have been adopted in all the States of the Union; we would not be spending vast millions of dollars every year to educate the children of this country at public expense to fit them for citizenship. Everybody knows that it is a part of our national policy to make men intelligent by education, because intelligence, as well as virtue, is the foundation of our civilization and the guaranty of the stability of free institutions. My advocacy of this amendment is because it is a mild restrictive measure, one intended to restrict the flow of these streams of immigration that have overcrowded with common or unskilled laborers the great centers of industrial operations, where these new elements have competed against each other as well as against American labor in the industries of the country, and because I look upon it as the one most feasible measure for that purpose.

The records of the Department of Labor indicate pretty clearly the scope and operation of this provision. During a period of 11 years—1899 to 1909, inclusive—the percentage of illiterates among the different races admitted was as follows: Only four-tenths of 1 per cent of the Scandinavians were illiterate; only seven-tenths of 1 per cent of the Scotch; only 1.1 per cent of the English; only 2 per cent of the Welsh; only 2.7 per cent of the Irish; only 4.7 per cent of the Dutch; only 5.4 per cent of the Germans; and only 5.4 per cent of the French.

The degree of illiteracy was, it will be observed, very low among all the races of northwestern Europe, and the operation of the reading test will hardly be felt by any of them. On the other hand, out of the million and a half admitted from south Italy, 54.2 per cent were unable to read; out of the 742,000 coming from Poland, or of the Polish race, 35.4 per cent were unable to read; of the almost half million of Hebrews, 25.7 per cent were unable to read; of the 312,000 Slovaks, 24.6 per cent were illiterate; of the 311,000 from north Italy, 11.8 per cent were illiterate; of the 283,000 from Hungary, 11.4 per cent were illiterate; and of about the same number of Croatians and Slovenians and Magyars, 36.4 per cent and 11.4 per cent, respectively, were illiterate; of the Russians, 34.7 per cent were illiterate. It will, therefore, be seen that the literacy test will apply more particularly to those races and nationalities that I have described than to any of the others. It will decrease the number coming from Russia, Austria-Hungary, the Balkan States, and from southern Italy, but will have hardly any effect upon the immigration coming from Great Britain, Germany, Ireland, Wales, the Scandinavian States, and France.

OVERCROWDED CONDITIONS DEMAND RESTRICTION.

The commission found in all of the seats of the basic industries, where labor was so overcrowded, that the men as a rule were living on from $9 to $15 a month, $15 a month being the maximum amount expended and $9 the minimum. The conditions under which they were living are described in the commission's report, as follows:

> The living conditions of southern and eastern Europeans and the members of their household is shown in the detailed studies of the various industries, the most significant indication of congestion and unsatisfactory living arrangements being the low-rent payments each month per capita. The recent immigrant males being usually single, or, if married, having left their wives abroad, have been able to adopt in large measure a group instead of a family living arrangement, and thereby to reduce their cost of living to a point far below that of the American or older immigrant in the same industry or the same level of occupations. The method of living usually followed is that commonly known as the "boarding-boss system." Under this arrangement a married immigrant or his wife, or a single man, constitutes the head of the household, which, in addition to the family of the head, will usually be made up of 2 to 20 boarders or lodgers. Each lodger pays the boarding boss a fixed sum, ordinarily from $2 to $3 per month, for lodging, cooking, and washing, the food being usually bought by the boarding boss and its cost shared equally by the individual members of the group. Another common arrangement is for each member of the household to purchase his own food and have it cooked separately. Under this general method of living, however, which prevails among the greater proportion of the immigrant households, the entire outlay for necessary living expenses of each adult member ranges from $9 to $15 each month. The additional expenditures of the recent immigrant wage earners have been small. Every effort has been made to save as much as possible. The life interest and activity of the average wage earner from southern and eastern Europe has seemed to revolve principally about three points: (1) To earn the largest possible amount of immediate earnings under existing conditions of work; (2) to live upon the basis of minimum cheapness; and (3) to save as much as possible. The ordinary comforts of life as insisted upon by the average American have been subordinated to the desire to reduce the cost of living to its lowest level.

Among these classes the usual avenues through which aliens come in touch with American life are largely lacking. Eighty-six per cent of the married men were living single lives, having left their wives in Europe, so that in these communities children were very few in number. Everyone who has studied the subject knows that in the work of assimilating our foreign population the public schools are the greatest of agencies in bringing them into touch with American life. Why? Because just as soon as the child of an alien enters the public schools he stands upon an equality with the native-born child; there is a perfect democracy in the public schools. They become acquainted, one with another; they join in sports; they visit the homes of others. You have seen it, and I have seen it. Through the agency of children the foreign family comes in touch with the American family, and the American housewife gets interested first in the alien children and then in the alien housewife. In that way the foreigners are brought under American influences; in touch with community and family life. They are made to feel that they are welcome, and they gradually develop into American citizens. But under the conditions described by the commission the men were found to be so many labor units, leading isolated lives, unable to come in touch with and caring nothing for American institutions, either National or State or municipal. It is an undesirable class to have in any thickly populated city, unless work is so plentiful that they can have constant employment, because when work is not plentiful and they are driven to the hardship which comes from poverty they become a dangerous element—not because they are bad men by nature but because they are ignorant of our institutions and are living isolated lives. They know and care little about us. To them American life and American institutions are sealed books. In prosperity they are industrious, quiet, and law-abiding; but in adversity they are suspicious, and when an agitator appeals to them, particularly if he be of foreign birth, they are the tinder to which he applies his torch, and they are the element that can be fanned into the flame that results oftentimes in riot, as was the case at Lawrence, Mass., only three years ago. They are a danger to society when living under such conditions.

I can not conceive of anything more dangerous in a thickly populated city than vast volumes of people of alien birth, the product of alien civilization, many of them unable to speak the English language, who never come in contact with American thought or American sentiment, who are not actuated by any of the impulses of American citizenship, and who are here simply to gain a livelihood which they can not get at home.

It may be interesting for the Senate to consider for a moment that in the city of New York there is a population of between four and five millions—about 4,700,000—and that only 19.3 per cent of that entire number have native-born fathers and mothers, 38.2 per cent are either of foreign or mixed parentage, and 40.4 per cent were actually born abroad. They are largely of the new immigration, right enough in regard to race, right enough in regard to purposes, composed of men who are willing to work, who are frugal in their habits; but, of course, they are common laborers; and if industries are threatened and depression comes that is the element from which we must expect more danger than from any other.

What I have said of New York can be said of Chicago. Only 20.4 per cent of the population of that city have native-born parents, while 41.8 per cent are either of foreign or mixed parentage, and 35.7 per cent were actually born abroad.

I select a town in New England—Lawrence—where that terrible and most deplorable strike occurred two or three years ago. It is a city with a population in round numbers of 85,000. Only 13.6 per cent of that population have native-born parents. Thirty-seven and nine-tenths per cent are of foreign or mixed parentage and 48.1 per cent—almost half of the population of the manufacturing city of Lawrence—were actually born abroad. What occurred there is known to all the world. In that overcrowded body of newly arrived aliens the Industrial Workers of the World found the material they desired, and in 24 hours had so succeeded in inflaming its passions that masses marched upon mills in which they had no interest with the purpose by force to stop their operation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. REED. Why did those people in Lawrence strike? Was it not for better wages?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They struck for better wages, and they also struck because they could not get steady employment, as they were there in such large numbers.

Mr. REED. Well, they struck for better wages.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. And they struck because agitators incited them to strike.

Mr. REED. They struck for better wages, and they struck at a time, at least, when they were encouraged by other people who came in. Was not the leader who came in and agitated this strike an American-born citizen?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator knows, I wish he would state it, because I do not know whether he was or not.

Mr. REED. I think he was; that is my understanding. I supposed the Senator could answer the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Now, I wish to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield further, and to whom?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I had yielded to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not interrupt the Senator from Missouri now.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask now if it is not true that acts of violence by strikers have been engaged in by American citizens just as they have been engaged in by foreign-born citizens? I call the attention of the Senator to the great railroad strike of a few years ago, when the whole commerce of our Nation was arrested, and I ask the Senator if the great majority of those railroad men were not only American citizens, but were they not also good citizens?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know to which of the strike leaders the Senator from Missouri alludes. I do not know whether or not Mr. Ettor is an American citizen by birth, but it has been stated over and over again that Mr. Giovannetti, who was one of the leaders of that strike, is not only not an American citizen, but that at that time he was a candidate for office in Italy. I do not know that that is a fact, but it has been stated to me by people who say that they know it to be a fact.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, this matter ought to be settled upon the right and wrong of it, and not upon any isolated case or upon impression. My understanding is that the head of the Industrial Workers of the World is an American citizen. If I am wrong in that, I should like to be corrected. My understanding further than that is that the majority of those who struck in the West Virginia mines recently were native-born American citizens. My understanding is that in the great railway strike of a few years ago the vast majority were American citizens. My understanding is that strikes are not confined to foreigners and that violence is not confined to foreign-born people; and I undertake to say that the figures will show that they have been more patient, more long-suffering, and less likely to rise in violence than our own native-born American citizens; and I can demonstrate that absolutely.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I hope the Senator did not understand my argument to be what his remarks would indicate. The point I was making was not that these are undesirable races, not that they are undesirable as individuals, but that when they come in such vast numbers as to compete against themselves and to live under the conditions I have described, where they are overcrowded, where they are without employment, they become then, under those conditions, an especially dangerous element in our society.

Mr. President, having shown that in these overcrowded communities of the industrial States the aliens constituting them are of the classes that I have indicated, largely males leading single lives, common or unskilled laborers in the main, a large proportion of them without steady employment, all of them living under conditions most undesirable, and a considerable percentage of them coming from nations where elementary education is sadly neglected, it is apparent that the Immigration Commission were wise when they recommended the reading test as the one most feasible method of meeting the situation. That is the point I wish to emphasize to the Senate, because in this discussion the merits of the literacy test and the purposes hoped to be accomplished through its inauguration have been discussed and considered upon every other ground than the true one.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to be led afield from the matter that is now pending before the Senate. The question we are discussing is within very small bounds. It is this, Shall an immigrant who can pass the moral test, the physical test, and the financial test be denied admission solely because he is unable to read and write, even though he can affirmatively show that he has been driven from his own country by persecution on account of his race?

The committee has reported a bill exempting from the literacy test those who are fleeing to escape religious persecution and those who are fleeing to escape political persecution. The sole question we are now discussing is whether we shall enlarge the literacy exemptions so as to also include within them those who are fleeing to escape racial persecution. It is not proposed a single man can come in because of racial persecution if he be morally or physically unclean. It is not proposed that he shall be admitted here unless he can pass every single test save the one test of literacy.

So far as I am concerned, I am unwilling to deny a human being who is fleeing from persecution the right of asylum and drive him back to the arms of his tormentors simply because he is uneducated. At the same time I do not believe we ought to permit those races of men who are incapable of amalgamating themselves with the American people to ordinarily settle within our borders. I recognize the fact that there are certain races of men who can not become American citizens as we understand that term, and who can not be brought to an understanding of our governmental conditions or our social life. They are of a different blood. They have different habits of thought. Our civilization from the home life to governmental methods is in antagonism with their very natures. Hence, if they were to become a part of the body politic, they would not only be foreign to it when they joined it, but they and their children and their children's children would remain foreign.

The oriental is in a class by himself. His instincts, mental processes, aspirations, passions, and philosophy are all fundamentally different from ours. I am willing to join the committee in excluding by name all such races of men; but the question we are discussing is not that question. This bill proceeds upon the assumption that it is right to admit emigrants from all foreign countries save China. It proposes to exclude certain individuals who can not pass particular tests. Now, the question is whether some of those races whom we admit it is proper to allow to emigrate to this country, whom we admit will be entitled to residence and to citizenship here if they can read, shall be excluded because they can not read if they have come to this country to escape racial persecution. That is the whole question now before the Senate.

I shall discuss that special question a little later on. Just now I deem it pertinent to call attention to the real purpose back of this bill. That purpose is to limit foreign immigration of every kind. I have not the slightest doubt that the responsible authors of this bill, if they thought it possible so to do, would have here a bill prohibiting all immigration into the United States. They seek to escape from that broad position, and yet in a measure accomplish their end, by declaiming against recent immigration. They do not dare stand before the American people on the old know-nothing platform, which has been a byword now for nearly half a century, and declare that this country of America is for Americans. They do not dare condemn the German citizen and his sons, the Irishman and his children, the Englishman, the Scotchman, and the Welshman. These nationalities are strong in this country. The political party that undertook to condemn them would find itself relegated to privacy at the next election. Not only would these foreign-born people and their sons vote against such a proposition and such a party, but broad-minded, native-born American citizens would join in the condemnation.

I took occasion several days ago, I think on the 10th of December, to discuss this question of who are foreigners and who are Americans. When, if you please, does one get to be an American citizen? I listened to the marvelous array of figures presented here by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] in which, in order to demonstrate that there was a very large proportion of foreign population engaged in certain industries, he added to the foreign-born citizens those who were the children of foreign-born citizens. That kind of juggling with figures does not impress me.

When do you get to be an American citizen, anyway? If a boy whose parents or one of whose parents was born in Europe, but who was himself born upon this soil, and who is entitled to all the rights and privileges of an American citizen, is not entitled in this discussion to be regarded as an American citizen, then will his son in turn be an American citizen? How many generations must one's parents have lived in this country in order that he may be entitled to call himself an American?

When I hear this cry against foreigners I wonder if we or our ancestors were not all once foreigners. Whence did we come? If the Senator from Vermont can trace his ancestry back—and I know not how far he can—through a long line of individuals who happened to be born upon this soil, is he thereby any better citizen than the man who finds that his parents were born in Europe and he himself was born here? Or is that individual any better than the man born in Europe?

What constitutes an American citizen? Is it the number of generations your people have been here? If so, if you set the number at more than one generation, you would exclude many Members of this body; you would exclude many Members of the House of Representatives; you would exclude from your list poets, orators, statesmen, artists, physicians, lawyers, ministers, musicians, merchants, manufacturers, historians, who have contributed to the glory of our Nation. You would exclude them by the thousands and tens of thousands—those who have helped establish our industrial primacy.

What constitutes the length of pedigree you must have before you can be said to be "standard bred"? When are you standard bred? Must you be able to show that no ancestor back to the third generation has been guilty of the crime of being born under a foreign sky, or must it be five or six or seven generations, or shall it be but one? When are you entitled to wear the royal purple? And then, when you trace your ancestry back to five or six or seven generations, is it necessary that you shall find that your ancestors came from a certain country and measured up to certain conditions? If you apply that test, how many shall be entitled to be regarded as really blue blooded?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, this is a question of most vital importance, and it seems to me we should have a quorum. I raise the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON). The Senator from New Jersey suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Page	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Hollis	Perkins	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Hughes	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Jones	Pomerene	Smoot
Clapp	Kern	Ransdell	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Reed	Thomas
Culberson	Lane	Robinson	Thornton
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Root	Vardaman
Dillingham	Lewis	Saulsbury	White
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Williams
Gallinger	Nelson	Sheppard
Gore	Newlands	Shields
Gronna	Overman	Simmons

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I again announce regarding the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] that he is absent from the Senate on public business. He is paired with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was asking the question how long a man's pedigree had to be in this country in order to entitle him to call himself an American citizen. Then I suggested that if we went back to the time when his ancestors came to this country, we might find that they came under the same difficulties, had the same vile habits, and were of the same low order of intellect that it is now charged afflict the present-day immigrant.

I wonder if some of these American aristocrats, if they were to go back far enough, might not find that some one of their remote grandmothers was sold upon the auction block and paid for in long green tobacco? In those days, when we had the "old immigration," now so highly praised by the authors of this bill, European nations dumped their prison hordes upon these shores. Shipowners carried over indentured servants here and sold them into practical slavery. I wonder how many of the modern aristocrats, who curl their lips in fine scorn at the poor fellow who now seeks asylum, could trace their ancestry back to that kind of an immigrant?

When in this Chamber I hear these people who flee from persecution in other lands denounced as vicious and bad because they are unlettered I can not forget that when some of our early immigrants, now so much lauded, landed upon these shores they came with instruments of torture in one hand and the Bible in the other and sought to find in the words of Holy Writ a warrant for religious persecution. I have in mind the fact that some of these old immigrants whom we now so much do eulogize and love drove Roger Williams into the wilderness, and that upon the hills of Massachusetts they lighted the flames that drank up the blood of poor old women being executed for the imaginary crime of witchcraft. I recall to mind that some of this original immigration and parent stock was willing with fagot and sword to exterminate an entire colony because its inhabitants worshiped God under a cross that now points toward the sky from every hamlet and village of our land.

We are told that the ancient immigration was all good, that it was a most noble class of noble men and women, and yet, sir, this cry that is made in the Senate in the closing days of the year of our Lord 1914 has been upon the lips of the proscriptionist from the days when our Republic was born. The same charge that is being made to-day against certain classes of foreigners has been made against every class of foreigners. I can duplicate every condition of horror that has been adverted to to-day by the utterances of those who stood opposed to foreign immigration in the early days of this Republic. I can cite you to illustrious examples and to words that fell from the lips of great men, who were sincere then as these even greater men of the present are sincere.

It is just a part of human nature, that is all. Everybody thinks he is an ornament to the State; that what he does is right. Likewise he thinks his family is better than his neighbors. For the same reason he regards the people of his community as better than the people of other communities. He has no difficulty in convincing himself that the people of his State are better than the people of any other State; he considers it an act of treason not to insist that the people of his country are better than the people of all other countries, and so reasoning from the standpoint of his own egotism and his own ignorance, he elevates himself to a pinnacle of glory, and he condemns all who are not of his country, kith, and kin to a position of ignominy. Accordingly he translates the sentence "The world is the Lord's and the fullness thereof" into "the world is mine," and asserts the right to deprive others of a home upon God's footstool.

That, sir, is the creed of ignorance. It is the doctrine of proscription and hate. It is the philosophy of the Pharisee who wraps the mantle of his holiness about him and "thanks God he is not as other men." It is as old as human selfishness. It was born in cruelty. It has been nurtured in the lap of superstition. It has carried the torch and the thumbscrew and the rack into many lands. It has made this world to run red with blood. It has lighted the night of fear with the flames of martyrdom. It has no more place in America than has a wild beast of the jungle in the crowded street of a city. It is the voice of the fourteenth century echoing through the corridors of the twentieth century. It is the ugly visage of hate and scorn and malice leering through wicked eyes into the faces of the oppressed. It is nothing new.

The argument you make, sir, that the old immigration was good and that the new immigration is bad is a mere subterfuge and avoidance of the question. What you really want to do is to deprive the oppressed of other lands of a refuge in this land of freedom.

I said a moment ago that the same cry was raised against every race of men that ever landed on our soil, and I am about to prove it. It was raised against the Irish, the Germans, the Dutch, the Swedes, the Norwegians, the Welshmen, the Englishmen, the Scotchmen—all races of men. Somebody got here first, and then in his egotism, in his smallness, in his narrowness, he said, "I will keep all others out. Here God spread out the immeasurable forest; here He made the level plains; here He set the streams to flowing in majestic beauty; here He spread the flowers over the face of the land. I got here first, and nobody else shall come. I came here in rags and tatters and poverty; I came here in rebellion against the Government where I was born; I came here to worship God according to the dictates of my own conscience and make everybody else do the same thing and kill them if they would not; and now that I am here I say to those who are yonder, 'My clothing is now better than yours, my home is now better than yours. Continue in your rags and poverty and strain the eager eyes of hope and desire toward this land that God made for you the same as for me, but you shall stay where you are, always and forever to dwell in the hopeless night of tryanny and despair.'"

Thus have the exclusionists always sought to write the laws. At the same time we send missionaries and Bibles to the people we drive from our shores. We are willing to lead them to salvation, but we refuse them a place whereon to lay their heads. The doctrine of proscription ought never to be on the tongue of an American citizen.

But I return to call the attention of those who do me the compliment of listening to the proof I propose to advance that the old immigrant was no better regarded than the present immigrant; I exclude, of course, the undesirable races referred to in the early part of my remarks. The old immigrant was inveighed against as is the new immigrant. The country was warned of the awful fate impending if it permitted them to land. And now a word or two upon that. Senators will find it, I think, somewhat interesting to see how thoroughly narrow we have always been, and yet these narrow utterances have always been repudiated by the American people.

I warn Democratic Senators that if we pass a bill that is proscriptive, that is built on any other than the broad principle that we will admit to this country all people capable of becoming good citizens here, you will find that bill a millstone around the neck of the Democratic Party.

Returning, however, to my promised demonstration that the early immigrant was in his day and generation inveighed against as bitterly as is the present-day immigrant, I call your attention to a somewhat startling quotation. I read you a contemporaneous dissertation on the ancient immigrant, whom you now describe as "the good immigrant, the man who carried in his veins the royal blood that specially fitted him to become a great American citizen," the man you now credit with having built our railroads, erected our temples of worship, constructed our mighty cities, and otherwise done so much for our great country. Here is the contemporary dissertation I want to read on him, and then I will tell you its author and you will see that ignorance can not be charged to this man, and that he must have voiced a sentiment quite universal in his day among his class. The statement was made May 9, 1753. Its author was speaking of the Germans who had come to settle in Pennsylvania—ah, the sturdy Germans that we now say because they came from the north of Europe are the exact kind of people to make good citizens of. Speaking of them he said:

> Those who come hither are generally the most stupid of their own nation.

That is what these gentlemen are saying now about the recent immigrants:

> Those who come hither are generally the most stupid of their own nation, and as ignorance is often attended with great credulity, when knavery would mislead it * * * it is almost impossible to remove any prejudice they may entertain. * * * Not being used to liberty, they know not how to make modest use of it. * * * I remember when they modestly declined intermeddling with our elections; but now they come in droves and carry all before them, except in one or two counties.
> Few of their children know English. They import only books from Germany, and of the six printing houses in the Province two are entirely German, two half German half English, and but two are entirely English. They have one German newspaper and one half German. Advertisements intended to be general are now printed in Dutch and English. The signs in our streets (Philadelphia) have inscriptions in both languages and some places only in German. They begin of late to make all their bonds and other legal instruments in their own language, which (though I think it ought not to be) are allowed in our courts, where the German business so increases that there is continued need of interpreters, and I suppose in a few years they will also be necessary in the assembly, to tell one half of our legislators what the other half says. In short, unless the stream of importation could be turned from this to other colonies, as you very judiciously propose, they will soon outnumber us, that all the advantages we will have will, in my opinion, be not able to preserve our language, and even our Government will become precarious.

That is what was said of the Germans in 1753, on the 9th day of May, by Benjamin Franklin. How far Franklin was mistaken! That narrow view of a great people is undoubtedly the greatest mistake of that great man's life. People were narrower then than they are now or than they have been until very recently. That is what Franklin thought of the sturdy Germanic people who were then coming to this country.

But what did these immigrants do? They made the land to blossom as the rose. They brought with them their religion; they erected schoolhouses and temples of worship; they gathered their families about them, and from their veins flowed that stream of blood the committee declares gave added strength and vigor to the American commonwealth.

If Benjamin Franklin lived to-day, I have no doubt what his position would be. He was capable of learning, and he would have frankly acknowledged his mistake.

But, sir, it is a fact that the Germans did come in such numbers that the apprehension became in part true. Franklin feared that the proceedings of the Legislature of Pennsylvania would have to be conducted in the German language, and it is a fact that from July 15 to September 28 the legislature ordered its minutes printed in both the German and English tongues, and that that practice was continued as late as 1790.

But did Pennsylvania become a German Province? What part of this country has more steadfastly stood for the dignity and greatness of our land than has Pennsylvania at every period of her history?

I pass from the Germans and from this comment upon them to another class of immigrants. Mr. Walker, who has written much on immigration questions, has this to say of the early immigrant, "the good immigrant," "the desirable immigrant," the immigrant whom the committee would have us believe was not at all like these poor fellows of to-day.

> The great majority of immigrants to this country were so poor that they could not buy their passage, and in order to meet the obligations incurred by them for passage money and other advances they were sold, after their arrival, into temporary servitude.

Is there anything like that going on to-day? There was something a little like it when we had the contract-labor laws that were put on the books at the instigation of New England, for which section the Senator from Vermont so eloquently speaks. I read on:

> The prepayment of the passage was the exception, and its subsequent discharge by compulsory labor the rule. The shipowners and ship merchants derived enormous profits from the sale of bodies of immigrants, as they charged very high rates for the passage, to which they added a heavy percentage—often more than a hundred per cent—for their risks. But the immigrants suffered bitterly from this traffic in human flesh. Old people, widows, and cripples would not sell well, while healthy parents with healthy children and young people of both sexes always found a ready market.

These are doubtless the progenitors of some of the aristocrats of to-day.

If the parents were too old to work, their children had to serve so much longer to make up the difference. When one or both parents died on the voyage, their children had to serve for them. The expenses of the whole family were summed up and charged upon the survivor or survivors. Adults had to serve from 3 to 6 years; children from 10 to 15 years, till they became of age; smaller children were, without charge, surrendered to masters, who had to raise and board them. As all servants signed indentures, they were called "indentured servants." Whenever a vessel arrived at Philadelphia or New York its passengers were offered at public sale. The ship was the market place, and the servants were struck off to the highest bidder. The country people either came themselves or sent agents or friends to procure what they wanted, be it a girl, or a "likely" boy, or an old housekeeper, or a whole family. * * * Parents sold their children in order to remain free themselves. When a young man or girl had an opportunity to get married they had to pay their master £5 or £6 for each year they had to serve. Yet a steerage passage never cost more than £10. * * * If the master did not want to keep his servant, he could sell him for the unexpired time of his term of servitude.

And you stand here advocating this bill, denouncing the poor fellow who comes to the country now, and must come with money in his pocket and without any contract and must pass a physical examination before he can enter and can show that he is morally clean. You stand here and denounce him and pronounce a eulogy and an encomium upon the ancient immigrant who came here in bonds and legal chains. How many of the aristocrats of to-day can trace their ancestry back to that illustrious period?

But, sir, I do not pause at this. Are there any here who have Irish blood in their veins? If I looked around this room I would see many; and who is there of them will for a moment deny his race? Those of us who have some Irish blood in our veins believe that it is the blood of a great race that was greatly wronged; a race that once the shackles were broken and it was given a fair chance in the contests of life demonstrated to all the world that in everything that makes for manhood and womanhood it can hold its place well at the head of the column of human progress and achievement.

As to the Irish, here is what Mr. Walker said about them when they were migrating, and I shall show you a little later on that the newspapers of that day said the same thing, for the American citizen of that day who believed in "America for Americans" joined in the cry. All the cries sound to me like the snarling of gray wolves mingled with the yelping of coyotes around the sheepfold of humanity.

Said Walker:

The conditions under which they (the Irish) had been born and brought up were generally of the most squalid and degrading character. Their wretched hovels, thatched with rotting straw, scantily furnished with light, hardly ventilated at all, frequently with no floor but the clay on which they were built, were crowded beyond the bounds of comfort, health, or, as it would seem to us, of simple social decency; their beds were heaps of straw or rags; their food consisted mainly of buttermilk and potatoes, often of the worst, and commonly inadequate in amount; their clothing was scanty and shabby.

Are any class of immigrants coming here now who are worse off than that? Why were these Irish poor? Ah, that is the question. Why are these immigrants coming now poor? That is the question. Is it the result of slothfulness, of indolence, of vice, of inherent disposition to be of the lazzarone, or is it because oppression's iron hand has closed the door of opportunity in their faces? If it be the former, exclude them; but if it be the latter, then in the name of the God of humanity do not deny them entrance to a land of hope.

Why was Ireland poor? Her mills had been closed by the decree of a conqueror. Her people had been crushed to the earth by those who took the lands away from their fathers. Her schools that once had flourished and had shed the light of intelligence throughout Europe had their windows barred. Her sons were hunted like wild beasts, and for sport. Cromwell soldiers had marched across the land bearing upon their bloody pikes the heads of slaughtered babes of Ireland. And so at last the Irish were made poor. They were driven into hovels. They did sleep upon rotten straw; it was the best they could get. They lived like animals, because they could not live like men. Yet through it all they clung to their religion and their wives and their children. But when they came to this country, sir, when they entered the land of opportunity, what did they do? Ah, they lived humbly here a while. They probably crowded into tenements, and they crowded many of them into a single room. They got work at any price they could obtain.

Their shovels and pickaxes were soon busy building railroads across the continent; they were glad to get the work; they lived in shanties. We used to call them "shanty Irish." Many of them could not read or write, but they had in their hearts glowing the flame of manhood; they had in their souls the courage to get on and to fight on in the world. After awhile the section hand became the section foreman, the section foreman became the superintendent of construction, and the superintendent of construction became the president of the railroad. After awhile the little, ragged urchin who played in the mud of the Irish shanty made his way in school; after awhile we heard of him at the bar, where the wonders of his eloquence thrilled and enthralled all who heard him; after awhile we saw him in the Halls of Congress; after awhile we heard his wonderful music upon the platform; after awhile we learned that the blossoms of beauty in the cheeks of the Irish girls had won the love of the American aristocrat's sons, and that, when Irish and native American bloods were united in the veins of their children, a stronger race had been produced. Now the Irish are respectable, and they are pointed to by this committee as illustrious examples of a desirable immigration.

In the good old days there were committees and newspapers to warn the people against the Irish, as there are those now to warn us against the present-day immigrant. On May 2, 1846, they had a strike of Irishmen. Behold these good Irish had struck as did the wicked people at Lawrence, Mass.

The same danger loomed big in the horizon then that now obscures the vision of my friend from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. The New York Weekly Times on May 2 1846, discussed the strike of Irish laborers in Brooklyn and said their earnings were barely sufficient to pay the rent of a decent tenement, so they were allowed to build miserable shanties on ground allotted them by the contractor on the plot occupied by them in performing the work.

A quarter of a century later—this brings us down now to a period after the war—these people were charged with living in "sickening kennels." That will be found in the report of the Massachusetts bureau of labor and statistics for 1869 and 1870, at page 80.

Here is a report by a city inspector in 1864. Speaking of the Irish, he says:

The tenants seem to wholly disregard personal cleanliness, if not the very first principles of decency, their general appearance and actions corresponding with their wretched abodes. This indifference to personal and domiciliary cleanliness is doubtless acquired from a long familiarity with the loathsome surroundings, wholly at variance with all moral or social improvements.

That is found in the report of the industrial commission at page 456.

Now, my friends, just for the sake of variety, let me call your attention to the fact that the Germans were no better than the Irish, according to the opinions of the people of those days. Here is another report on the foreign sections of New York City, made in 1878:

In many quarters of the city family life and the feeling of home are almost unknown—

How much that sounds like the dissertation of the Senator from Vermont, who a few moments ago complained that there were a lot of people who came here and left their wives behind because they did not have money enough to bring them; he complained that they did not have the feelings of home and he complained of how they lived together in great numbers in small quarters. Let me read this all again:

In many quarters of the city family life and the feeling of home are almost unknown; people live in great caravanseries, which are hot and stifling in summer, disagreeable in winter, and where children associate together in the worst way. In many rooms privacy and purity are unattainable, and young girls grow up accustomed to immodesty from their earliest years. Boys herd together in gangs and learn the practices of crime and vice before they are out of childhood. Even the laborers' families who occupy separate rooms in these buildings have no sense of home.

Dr. Griscom as early as 1842 had called attention to the "depraved effects which such modes of life exert upon the moral feelings and habits," and the city inspector in 1851 remarks that "these overpopulated houses are generally, if not always, seminaries of filthiness, indecency, and lawlessness."

That was made to apply to both the Irish and the Germans. Surely there is no new thing under the sun. The old serpent of proscription has had its habitat in every country. In every age it has crawled forth to thrust its forked tongue into the faces of the hopeless and the despairing. Here is something more about the Irish. The Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor in New York in 1859 reported that the Irish immigrant "had an utter distaste for felling forests and turning up the prairies for themselves. They preferred to stay where another race would furnish them with food, clothing, and labor, and hence were mostly found loitering on the lines of the public works in villages and in the worst portions of the large cities, where they competed with negroes for the most degraded employments."

Why, that is what you are saying now about the present-day immigrant, just as a few years ago you were charging that the Irish herded in the cities, that the Germans herded in the cities, that the Swedes herded in the cities, and that all these wicked foreigners herded in the cities. It was charged then just as truthfully as it is charged now. It is perhaps true that the Irish and Germans herded in the cities for a short time, but you now admit that they ultimately went to the farm, to the towns of the interior, where they and their descendants are found by the million.

Let us argue this question fairly. The same cry is upon your lips to-day that was upon the lips of the proscriptionists in 1859. That which you breathe out now against the immigrant who comes to our shores was then being uttered against the immigrant from Great Britain and the north of Europe, who you now say is an ornament to our society and a strength to our Republic. The whole mistake lies in this, that then, as now, the poor creature from an oppressed land who had lived under the iron rule of despotism, who had been denied opportunity, and who came here half starved and half naked, was estimated according to his condition when he arrived instead of estimating him according to his condition after he has had opportunity to benefit himself.

Mr. President, I could read at much greater length of the Irish and the Germans. I pass on, however, to show that the same cry has been raised against other races. In 1885 the New York Bureau of Immigration Statistics held a long hearing, just as this committee has had some hearings, and just as this commission we have heard about had hearings. They summed up their observations—they were speaking of the immigrants from northern Europe, the Danes and the Swedes—and they said of them that they "interfere very much with the keeping up of the wages in the trade," and that, therefore, they were an undesirable people. Whoever desires to follow that subject can read the Sixteenth Annual Report of the New York Bureau of Labor Statistics for 1898 and find the comment on page 1047.

So we find protest against Danes, against Swedes, against Irish, against Germans, against Dutch, and a general protest against all immigration, at least against German immigration, from Benjamin Franklin himself.

One of the principal arguments of the Know-nothing Party against foreign immigration, and particularly against Irish immigration, was that the Irish were a criminal race. The Know-nothing Party asserted that 1 out of every 154 Irishmen was a criminal, and hence they argued as follows—I am reading from Mr. Hourwich's very illuminating work:

> One of the favorite arguments against immigration since the days of the Know-nothings has been the assertion that "the foreigner, in proportion to his numbers, furnishes by far the greater part of crime." In the middle of the nineteenth century the Irish immigrant was the object of popular odium as one one hundred and fifty-fourth of a criminal.

That was the charge.

> The newspapers and pamphlets of that time published statistics which showed that, although the foreign population was only an eighth of the whole, yet it furnished * * * 1,000 more criminals than all the remaining seven-eighths of the people.

And they asserted that—

> Every 154 of them produced a criminal.

Of course those statistics were inaccurate; of course they could not be sustained; but it was the charge of the day; it was the attitude of the time; it was the cry then, as we have the cry now, against the people who come from impoverished lands seeking an opportunity and home here.

Mr. President, what is the reason for these views that have always been expressed with reference to immigrants to this country? A little sober analysis will afford the reason and a little fairness ought to give a correct anwser. The wealthy, the opulent, the happily situated in other lands remain where they are. We do not migrate from this land to Europe because our condition here is better than it would be in Europe. If conditions in America were to become worse than they are in Europe, there would be a migration from this country to Europe; but who would migrate? It would not be those who hold good offices; it would not be those who own the banks and the railroads; it would not be those who have good salaries; it would be that class of our people who found their condition most intolerable and who were seeking to better that condition.

That same rule has obtained at every period of history with reference to immigration from Europe, if we make the possible exception of those periods when there were considerable numbers fleeing to this country purely for conscience's sake and for religious liberty. There were, of course, in the very early days a few adventurous spirits who came here to establish themselves in principalities, to obtain enormous land grants, and so forth. I except them from the rule; but with these small exceptions—and they are so small as not to affect the grand total—the people who have come to this country in every age of our development have been those who in their own land were for the most part unhappily situated.

They came here because there were better wages; they came here because they were impoverished in their own land; and consequently when in the early days they migrated they indentured or mortgaged themselves—their bodies and almost their very souls—for passage across the ocean.

They came here from Ireland because the oppressor's heel was on the land and because poverty had cast its ghastly pall over the Green Isle until the Irish people were lined along the lanes almost in windrows of dead, rotting in the sun. They came here from other countries under similar conditions. Of course when they came they were poor, indescribably and unutterably poor. They did not look well. They had not had sufficient food for their bodies or enough clothing for their backs. That was true of most of them. There were others who came, of course, in somewhat better condition, but nearly all of them were poor, nearly all of them were fleeing oppression or fleeing poverty; all of them were coming here to better their condition; but when they came under those circumstances they often did not look well.

The American aristocrat turned up his nose and he said, "What a horrid-looking lot of horrid people are coming to this blessed land of ours." And yet his own ancestors only a few years back had come in the same or in a worse condition. The test is not how an immigrant looks when he comes here, but how he behaves when he gets here and what he develops into after he has been here a reasonable time.

So that, looking at these people as they come and as they exist the first few years after they are here, everyone can make a bad report and tell the truth. Uncharitable tongues have always been busy with evil prophecies; so it was spoken of the Irish and Germans. But after they had been here a while, when they had risen to respectability and power, we were told, and are now told, "that class of immigrants is all right." The Irishman is respectable now. Why? He has made his traducers respect him. The German is respectable now. Why? Because he has so built himself in this country that none dare traduce him.

The Swede, also, has become respectable, and he has come here at a later period; and the Norwegian, also, is respectable; yet I can remember when certain people were greatly alarmed lest the Swede would injure our country. But how long was it until these Swedes and Norwegians had made the prairies of Minnesota and of Dakota to blossom? How long was it until they had demonstrated to the people of this country that they were bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh, and that, measured by any standard of manhood or civilization, they were entitled to their place along with the best?

Mr. President, I heard an argument made here this afternoon that we ought to exclude the Austrian. Pray, who are the Austrians? Is the Austrian not of as good blood as the German? Is he not as strong in body? Is he not as moral in life? Is he not of the white race? Is he not brave upon the field of battle? Is he not patriotic? Does he not obey the law? Does he not love wife and children? Does he not erect homes? Does he not build temples of art? Does he not bow to the same God you worship? Has he not given to history thousands of illustrious names?

Prejudice is a veil that, drawn before the eyes of man, distorts his vision. He sees the fairest forms distorted into diabolic shapes; he beholds the evil countenance of satan transformed into the visage of an angel. Prejudice is the narrowest thing in all this world; it is the meanest thing in human nature; it is at once the parent and the child of ignorance; it has done more to withhold the march of human progress than all other human imperfections.

I heard here some sneering remarks aimed at the Servians; and yet that little people, poor but gallant, brave almost beyond belief, are at this hour standing within the natural fortresses of their hills and dying for their homes, their wives, their children, and their liberty as courageously as ever stood the soldiers of the Revolution with Washington in the days when our country sought to throw off the oppressor.

I hear read these statistics showing that there are many illiterates among the Belgians, and I find the fine-grained, delicate sensibilities of some American citizens are tremendously disturbed at the ignorance of the Belgians. Ah, my fellow Senators, that argument does not sound as well to the ears of people to-day as it would have 22 weeks ago, for now we see that people—men, women, and children—rallying in defense of the fatherland they love. We see every boy capable of bearing arms standing on the red line and dying for his country and his home. We behold them charging into the roaring mouths of cannon, and in the grip of death cheering for that liberty for which they yield their lives. What man is there now to say that the Belgian people are incapable of becoming good American citizens?

If the Senator who has introduced this bill could introduce a million Belgians into his State, in 50 years of time its wealth would quadruple and its swamps and its morasses and its forests would be turned into gardens that would be equal in beauty to the gardens that his ancestors and his people have already planted. If a time ever came when it was necessary to defend this flag and this country, would God we had a million of the sons of Belgium to touch elbow with the sons of Ireland and the sons of England and of France and America in defense of the home of human liberty!

Why, about all the leaders of the world's dominant thought have done for a thousand years has been to teach people to hate each other. The Englishman stood and looked across the little narrow channel and denounced the Frenchman. The Frenchman hated the Englishman. Both of them scorned the German. The German in turn gave back their contempt in good measure. So prejudice was built up, and nations were taught to distrust and despise each other. They could give each other credit for nothing. After a while that iron bond of prejudice made these countries provincial and caused them to retrograde. If you want to find a progressive country you go to one that has opened its doors generously. If you want to find a country that is rotting and dying, search for one that has proscribed other peoples.

China rose to a position of greatness marvelous beyond our present knowledge, I doubt not. Her literature was the most wondrous in the world, her cities the most beautiful, her people the most cultured. She taught, before the days of Christ, the principles of the Golden Rule. Her philosophers produced thoughts of such beauty that they are read to-day and counted as among the choicest jewels in the casket of human knowledge. But China walled herself in. She denied her ports to other peoples. She concluded to live by herself and for herself; and so, save as she atrophied and died, she sat unchanging and unchanged while the procession of human progress marched on and the world left her behind.

Japan closed her ports and declared herself to be superior to other nations. She excluded foreigners. She would have neither foreign blood nor foreign learning, until she sank to a condition where a half dozen little vessels could enter her ports, humble her, and compel her to open her doors to the commerce of the world. Let me say to you that when Japan awoke, she awoke because those doors had been battered down with cannon. She began to find out that there were superior races and nations, at least in power, to her. She began sending her young men to the universities of the world. She began to invite trade and commerce and settlement; and suddenly there ran through her veins a new life, and Japan rose, a giant, from the bed in which she had slumbered for centuries.

India closed her doors. She sank into an intellectual torpor. She stretched herself upon a couch of death. Still she sleeps on.

Turkey excluded foreigners, and behold the "unspeakable Turk," who lives as lived his ancestors of 3,000 years ago, save this, that all their glory is departed and all their genius has expired.

What nations have flourished? It has been those nations that have opened their doors and that have reached out their hands to gain knowledge from other countries. It is those nations that have had an admixture of blood that have led the van of human progress.

Why, sirs, if you were to ask me to point you to the great primal cause that has brought about the civilization of this day I would say that it was due to the fact that from the forests of Germany there swept out a tidal wave of emigration so powerful that it could not be stopped by proscription or by the mandate or armies of a king. It poured on in a resistless flood and transformed ancient Gaul into France. Another stream overran ancient Brittany and transformed it into England. Another stream from Norway and Sweden and Denmark broke against the shores of England and of France; there the Norsemen established themselves, built cities, and mixed their blood with the parent blood of the conquered peoples, and from that united stream there came a stronger race of men.

If you were to ask me to point you further, I would say that Germany's first great step toward dominance and world power was taken when Frederick the Great invited the learned men of every land to come to Prussia, when he raked the world almost with a fine-toothed comb for its genius, when he said to the artisans of Europe and all other countries, "Come hither! Here awaits you an opportunity to develop your genius and to help upbuild this State." It was because of that, more than because of his genius in war, that Frederick the Great was able to lay the foundations of the Prussian Kingdom, which became ultimately the nucleus of the German Empire.

England for centuries has led the van of human progress. England's doors have been swinging open for centuries. Her laws have been more generous than those of the countries which surrounded her. France has stood in the very forefront, and France has generously welcomed the foreigner. But turn to Spain, if you will, and if you ask when Spain took her first fatal step, I answer you, when she drove the Jews from her borders.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. In connection with that same thought, France at one time closed her doors against the Jews, and became so desolate in her distress that she opened them again, and from that time on came her progress.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I was going to mention that, but I thank the Senator for his contribution. France and all of these countries at one time drove out some of their own peoples. The Huguenots were expelled, and when France expelled the Huguenots she cast out the best part of her genius and her courage and suffered for it for centuries afterwards.

Proscription has never made any nation great. The nations that have reached out, gathered in the surrounding people, adopted them into themselves, seized upon their superior qualities, and made them their own are the nations that have always prospered in this world.

Now, let me for a moment review our own history. Ah, let us be frank! There are those of us so proud of this country that we have almost convinced ourselves that God created a peculiar race especially that it might come here and populate this land; that all the women were queens of beauty and paragons of virtue, and all the men were lordly knights, gallant chieftains, to whose proud veins we trace our illustrious lineage. But what are the facts? I have already adverted to them, but briefly.

First, the adventurer; but when the adventurer came he brought with him many of the humble class, the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. Then came some who were persecuted for their religion. Then came some fleeing from political persecution; but then came the great mass which makes up the body of the ancient American people, if I may use that term. They were the starvelings of Europe. They were the impoverished. Many came, as I have shown you, as indentured servants. They sold their bodies for their passage. They came here in ignorance, in poverty, in rags, in superstition; but they came here in response to one sentiment which, if it dwell in a human heart, will transform that human being into a man and a citizen. That was the love of liberty, the hatred of oppression, the determination, at whatsoever cost, to achieve liberty. And so they sold their bodies into chains temporarily, to the end that they and their children might walk on free soil, gaze with free eyes upon a free sky, and enjoy the blessings of liberty.

Whenever you find in a race of people a willingness to sacrifice so much to gain freedom, you need not fear them. Aye, they are the people who will most carefully guard liberty. Think you, sir, that the Irish, who came here from their impoverished land, who all their lives had seen English landlords skimming the cream from the land, who saw their sons dragged to jail, their women mistreated, their industries ruined, their families crowded into tenants' hovels with thatched, rotten roofs—think you that when they came to this country and found a government that gave equality of opportunity to all they would not love that government with a fervor that could not for a moment thrill the heart of a man who had not been thus oppressed? Do you think, sir, that if a hundred thousand Belgians were to land upon our coast next year there would be, in the hundred thousand, a single man who would want to see this government transformed into a military autocracy? Nay. On the other hand, he would join every patriot here to protest against it. Think you, if he saw a foreign monarch with his fleets of war entering our ports, this man, who had felt the oppressor's heel, who had clanked the oppressor's chains, would not be the first to offer his life in defense of liberty? The whole question is, Have the people coming here the quality of progress? Have they love of liberty?

In the opening days of this new century, at the close of the greatest century of the world's progress, we are asked to change our policies; and why? Always our doors have stood open. These poor people have come here from other lands and have accepted the office of the hewer of wood and the drawer of water. They have lived humbly. They have lived in poverty,

They have lived as best they could live until the hard conditions of life could be ameliorated. Always the proscriptionist has stood and warned us that these people would sink the ship of State, that they would destroy our Government, that they would ruin our population; but always, in everincreasing hordes, they have come, more and still more of them, and as our population has increased they have increased in numbers.

What is the result? Have our farms depreciated in value? Why, sirs, the little narrow strip of settlements upon the eastern coast have been extended to the Pacific. The desert has been rescued from the grip of drought and turned into splendid farms. We have expanded until we are 90,000,000 of people, and proudly say these 90,000,000 of people are the best people on earth. I am in accord with that sentiment. Who are they? They are the offspring of these immigrants.

Who built these railroads? Have we been slow in our progress? Who erected our mighty cities? Have we been backward in that? Who has put up the walls of these schools and seminaries? Have we been behind the world in that?

Why, my fellow citizens, the marvel and miracle of all the ages is the progress of America. We have gone forward, step by step—aye, we have gone forward by bounds. In two centuries of time we have builded the greatest Nation the sun has looked upon since first it kissed the horizon of creation. Is there anything in that history to make us fearful?

The Jew has come. Has he ruined us? Are we afraid of the Jew? The Irishman came. Did he ruin us? Are we afraid of the Irish? Why, if this country were in danger to-day, do you fear what the Irish citizen would do, whether born here or born yonder? Have the Germans ruined us? Have not the combined energies of all these races of men united in one gigantic forward movement that has pushed the car of progress, in a hundred years of time, a greater distance than it traveled since Adam was created? In all the intervening time it did not go so far.

Is our race dwindling physically? I think not, sir. I think, man for man, we are better than the other races of the earth. Have we dwindled mentally? I think not, sir. I think, man for man, we are keener, shrewder, and superior to the other races of the earth; and yet I do not think we know it all, nor that we can not learn from others.

Has this country been ruined? I affirm that if we had set up a policy of proscription on the 4th day of July, 1776, we would probably have been reconquered by England in 1812. I affirm that we would have been a weak and puny nation; that our civilization probably would not yet have reached the western borders of Ohio; that in all likelihood some foreign country would have established itself in all the western two-thirds of the United States; and that we, instead of being the greatest Nation of the earth, would have been among the weakest, even if we were at all able to maintain our independence.

RECESS—HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move that not later than 6 o'clock to-day the Senate shall take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it the idea of the Senator to begin the daily sessions at 11 o'clock hereafter?

Mr. KERN. No; simply for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 29, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee that Thou hast spared our lives and permitted us to enjoy another Christmas, with its hallowed associations, sacred memories, and holy influences, which strengthens the ties of friendship, deepens the affections, and brings us nearer to Thee and our fellow men. Grant, O most merciful Father, that the Christ spirit may abide with us and lead us on to greater attainments in the work Thou hast given us to do. We thank Thee that peace abides within our borders; continue, we beseech Thee, our peaceful relations with all the world. And glory and honor and praise be Thine forever, in the spirit of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, December 23, 1914, was read and approved.

PEACE RESOUTIONS, SALEM QUARTERLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk a memorial in the interest of peace by the Salem Quarterly Meeting of Friends, at Woodbury, N. J., December 10, 1914.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] asks unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk the paper to which he has referred. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Speaker and House of Representatives, United States Congress, Washington, D. C.:

The Salem Quarterly Meeting of Friends (with a membership of about 1,000) were earnestly engaged on the subject of peace during its sessions at Woodbury, N. J., December 10, 1914.

We wish to commend our President and United States Congress for your successful effort in maintaining peace with other nations and wish to assure our continued support in maintaining this attitude both in Mexico and in Europe.

We also wish to offer our protest against the increase of armament, war vessels, and greater fortresses in preparation for war. The present fortifications along our 4,000 miles of seacoast have been sufficient for the last 100 years. We therefore most earnestly urge our Congress to refuse the consideration of any measure tending toward war, not only because we, a Christian body, believe war is wrong, but we are opposed to adding greater burdens of taxation upon our people by creating and maintaining such warlike defenses as is now proposed.

If the United States can maintain its position of neutrality until the end of this European war, we trust that it will be able to exert a decisive influence for the establishing a plan for the settlement hereafter of all international differences, without resorting to war.

On behalf of Salem quarterly meeting.

CHAS. D. LIPPINCOTT, Clerk.

SWEDESBORO, N. J., December 10, 1914.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 20347) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes (H. Rept. 1250), which was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made by J. P. Doyle, a farmer living in Illinois, on the subject of rural credits and some problems of the farmer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech made by one of his constituents, a Mr. Doyle, on the subject of rural-bank credits. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman read the paper?

Mr. FOSTER. I have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think the information is of value to the membership of the House?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I think so, and it is an expression of a farmer who is interested in the matter of rural credits and has studied the question, and that class of people are directly affected by legislation that I hope will come before Congress at an early date.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not object to this request, but I think it ought not to be taken as a precedent that every farmer who has an opinion can extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. There are some of us who represent large agricultural districts who believe that the farmers have a right to be heard on the floor of this House and to give expression to views which they may have on subjects that directly affect them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am always glad to hear from the farmers on this floor through their accredited representatives. That does not mean that every farmer has a right to speak, however.

Mr. FOSTER. I take pleasure in presenting the views of such men as Mr. Doyle and other men who work upon the farm, and the farmers are the large producers of wealth in this country and entitled to be heard.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman should remember that the leader of the Democratic Party on this floor promised the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and the gentleman from Oklahoma that in all probability there would be a bill brought out before Congress for action if they called off their filibuster. They called it off, and the gentleman has not been able to bring it up. Has the gentleman from Illinois any inside information that they will be able to bring in such a bill, despite the opposition referred to?

Mr. FOSTER. "The gentleman from Illinois" has no inside information. He is only an humble Member on the floor of this House, representing a large constituency of farmers, but he does believe before this present administration ends and before Mr. Wilson is reelected President of the United States——

Mr. MANN. That will run till the end of time.

Mr. FOSTER. Or another Democrat is elected President of the United States, which will be in 1916, and another Democratic Congress is elected in 1916, if not at this session, there will be legislation upon this particular subject that will be satisfactory to the farmers of the country, and I am sure every effort will be made in the House and among Democratic leaders to enact such legislation as will give to the farmers of this country that which was not given them during the long term of your party in the House and in complete control of the Government.

Mr. MANN. They were all prosperous then.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] whether this is intended as an explanation of, or an apology for, the fact that the Democrats do not intend to enact such legislation?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman who writes this article is not a Democrat, but he is a real farmer, and politics should make no difference anyway in such legislation.

Mr. MANN. There are very few farmers who are Democrats.

Mr. FOSTER. But he looked to your party for so many years for relief, and which the party failed to give him, that he now looks to a Democratic Congress and a Democratic administration to give the relief that ought to have been afforded while your party was in power.

Mr. MANN. I think it is asking in vain.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, not at all.

Mr. ADAIR. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLOAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to get some information about the article.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. WINGO. I shall have to object, if I can not get some information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] objects.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky rose.

The SPEAKER. The debate on that other matter is ended. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, just before the House adjourned for the Christmas holidays we had under discussion here a proposition relative to the extermination of the foot-and-mouth disease among cattle. On that subject I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Say 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] asks leave to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota what is his purpose? Is it a personal question?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. It is a personal question, as I understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman state what it is?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I have some committee work, or some matters before the committees, and I want to inquire about them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is evidently a question that involves the working of the House. If it were a matter personal to the gentleman I would not object, but if it is a matter of general debate, Mr. Speaker, I can not agree to it at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that what I have in mind is important to this House, as I conceive it, and I think I ought to be permitted to have 10 minutes. I have been here 21 months and I have not asked to consume much of the time of this House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is it about?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Well, it has nothing to do with appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I might object if it had anything to do with appropriations, but I might not object if it were about some other matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, we shall have an appropriation bill up in a few moments, when everybody can discuss some outside subject under general debate. I do not think that at the short session of Congress we can consent to general debate outside of appropriation bills and otherwise than at the places where it would naturally come. Of course I would not object to a personal explanation of the gentleman, or a question of personal privilege; but if it is a matter of general debate, relating to politics or the machinery of the House, I shall be compelled to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] objects.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and therefore I move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that point until the Chair can lay some matters before the House?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Yes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. AUSTIN, for one week, on account of illness.

To Mr. BRUMBAUGH, for two weeks, on account of illness in hospital.

To Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin, for 10 legislative days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. BARTON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. DAVIS, for five days, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the mineral resources of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WEAVER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the mineral resources of Oklahoma. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I shall get some time in the discussion of the Post Office appropriation bill, and I withdraw my point for the present.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], if he is here, will take the chair. If not, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] will take the chair until the gentleman from Virginia gets here.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19906, the Post Office appropriation bill, with Mr. FERRIS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19906, the Post Office appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and fellow Members, I have been with you about 21 months. I have not consumed any time for the purpose of padding the RECORD.

I have tried to do my duty as I have seen it. I represent a constituency which is of some importance in this great country, and they look to me and to this House for results. About 400,000 people in my district are expecting results at the hands of this Congress, and they have delegated me to come here and make their wants known. The great people whom I represent pay into the National Treasury of the United States, in the way of postal receipts, customs receipts, internal-revenue receipts, and special revenue taxes and income taxes, nearly $8,000,000 annually, or about $20 for every man, woman, and child in my district, about twice what the average citizen throughout this country pays to support this Government.

I wish it distinctly understood that I have the most friendly feeling for the great Speaker of this House. I have the most pleasant feelings for the leaders of this House on both sides. I have the warmest spot in my heart for every Member here personally, and what I am going to say is not in the way of complaint actuated by ill feeling. It is simply to call the attention of this House to a system that ought not to exist in this great body. Too much is at stake for us to while away our time in idleness. I have before the committees of this House at least half a dozen bills, if not more. Those bills affect in one way or another the interests of the district which I represent, and up to this time I have not been able to get a hearing upon them.

We have been told that a program of legislation has been laid out for us to follow, and I have patiently, earnestly, and diligently cooperated with the powers that be to put through that program of legislation.

Now we are confronted with another program of legislation, and what does it contain? It contains a general dam bill that smells to heaven with its rottenness. It contains a ship-purchase bill that is of very doubtful value to this great Government. About half a dozen committees out of fifty are doing the work of the House. We sit here day in and day out, playing thumbs up and thumbs down when the great leaders of this House give the word. We are getting our money under false pretenses. I admire and respect our leaders, but at the same time I want to impress upon them now that while they are devoting their attention to a few big things the minor matters of legislation are being neglected—the measures which keep this country moving. Those things go by the board. You gentlemen who are responsible for appointing these committees should ascertain what they are doing. Each committee has three or four clerks, good men, all anxious to work; but I venture to say that outside of five committees in this House not one of those clerks has earned a day's wages in three months. Is that business? Is not that taking the people's money under false pretenses? Are we not carrying on a sham battle here? How long is it to continue?

I have no criticism against any individual be he a leader or be he the chairman of any committee. I am simply pointing out to this House to-day that there are at least 40 committees doing nothing to help along the legislation that they have before them; that they are doing nothing to help our constituents. For over a year they have had important bills before them, bills which they have never considered, and which the chairmen of those committees do not even know are pending before them. Gentlemen, this is not business; this is not the way to conduct business.

I want to serve notice on you now that during the remainder of my term in this House I want the matters pertaining to my district to receive proper consideration. If they are not fair measures, then disallow them, but at least give them a hearing. And I want the same respect given to every other Member's bills. The interests of this great Government can not always be properly cared for by having only a few measures pending and only a few men attending to big things. Let those of superior knowledge and great wisdom in matters of state take care of those big things, but let us with less experience take care of the minor matters that are of more importance to our respective districts.

Because of the courtesy of the Post Office Committee in allowing me this opportunity to speak, I shall not raise the point of no quorum to-day, but I give notice now that after to-day you will keep a quorum here if you are going to transact business or else you gentlemen who are responsible for the make-up of the committees of this House will see that the chairmen of those committees hold committee meetings. That is a fair proposition; it is an honest proposition; it is a proposition that I regret to have to make, but I have no apologies for making it. I am sincere about this matter. I am in dead earnest. I am not disappointed. I am simply doing what any honest official ought to do—expose a system that is wrong, that has grown up in such a way as to stifle legislation instead of promoting it. How long will it continue? It is for this body to say, unless these great leaders remedy this condition.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I will yield.

Mr. HOWARD. I am in the same position that the gentleman is in. Will the gentleman suggest some method by which this House can possibly consider 20,000 bills which the other Members of this House think are as important to them as the gentleman thinks his bills are important to him?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. You know and I know that 19,000 of those bills are duplicates that do not have to be considered.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. But you all know that you have measures before this House that are important to your respective districts and to the people of the whole country. Let us get them out. Do you not think that it is about time that we cease following a legislative program which presents for our consideration, in part, at least, legislation that is apt to be very detrimental and mischievous and take up a program of our own until we have disposed of such matters as are pressing for immediate action, and then, if we have any time left, we can fall back on this made-to-order and furnished-free-of-expense program and see what there is in it that commends itself to us?

Mr. DIES. Does the gentleman realize that he is now preventing the House from considering the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I realize this, but I want the House to understand that unless the committees of this House get to work——

Mr. DIES. How can they get to work when the gentleman has the floor? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Never mind, that is cheap witticism, but I will give you something that is not cheap. Until the committees get to work there will be no work done in this House on unanimous-consent day, or at any time, without a quorum.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. My time has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has 47 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Tennessee has 37 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois such time as he desires.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in the Washington Post of Sunday, and I suppose in many other newspapers were similar articles, there appeared an article headed:

FAMINE STALKS THROUGH MEXICO; WIDOWS AND ORPHANS BEG FOOD.

Conditions of famine and suffering in Mexico, said by some observers to rival the distress in the European theaters of war, are described in reports yesterday to the American Red Cross with appeals for help.

Consul General Hanna has sent the following message from Monterey:

"There is an alarming shortage of staple food supplies. Several outlying towns are appealing to me for help. If the winter keeps cold there will be great suffering. I need 2,000 cheap blankets. After four years of war this whole country is short of food."

The consul at Matamoras confirms an appeal, which said:

"The conditions in Europe which shock the civilized world have existed here against our borders for four years unconsidered. Mexico is peopled with widows and orphans, and famine is in the land. One sees it daily in emaciated forms, shrunken cheeks, tightly drawn skin, and burning eyes, sees it in the faces of women, old men, and little children. Many have died on American soil during the past year, ostensibly from obscure diseases, but actually from starvation, and there are hundreds of children who have never had sufficient food in their lives. The sound of laughter and playing children is stilled in Mexico."

In another article in the same paper is the statement:

MEXICO CITY, December 26.

The circular by Provisional President Gutierrez ordering all generals recognizing the Anguascallentes convention to cease summary executions declares:

"There has come to my knowledge, causing me both pain and displeasure, that all social classes in this city are in a state of alarm and even panic-stricken at the continual disappearance of individuals who are kidnaped by night, either to exact money from them or to be murdered in some secluded place."

We do not let anybody else interfere in Mexico; we permit no other Government to go there and demand order, and I fear that this policy of ours, as it has been pursued of late, makes us responsible for the secret murders, as well as for the famine, the starvation, the stilling of sound of laughter and play of children in Mexico.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. The article just read by the gentleman from Illinois says that this horrible war has been going on for four long years, two and a half years of which was under Republican administration, at a time when the gentleman from Illinois was the leader of the Republican side of the House. Will the gentleman tell us why it was not stopped during the two and a half years that his party was in power, when it was more easily stopped than it is now?

Mr. MANN. Is that a satisfactory question to my friend from Indiana?

Mr. ADAIR. It may not be satisfactory to the gentleman from Illinois, and although I would like an answer I do not want to embarrass the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Is it satisfactory to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. ADAIR. What is satisfactory?

Mr. MANN. The question that the gentleman has just asked.

Mr. ADAIR. Is the question satisfactory? Why, the statement that the gentleman makes on the floor of the House is that this administration is responsible for this situation, and that is not satisfactory, because it is not true.

Mr. MANN. I have made no statement concerning this administration. What I have said is true, and when the gentleman from Indiana says it is not true, he is trespassing on common politeness. He knows that it is true.

Mr. ADAIR. Why will not the gentleman explain to the House why his party did not stop it?

Mr. MANN. I have not had a chance.

Mr. ADAIR. I will give the gentleman a chance.

Mr. MANN. Whenever a proposition is made in this House concerning existing conditions, some gentleman on the Democratic side of the House, with more enthusiasm than information, rises, always hoping to get into the debate, and says "Why did not the Republicans fix it when they were in power." Well, we made a great many reforms while we were in power, but we could not make the world entirely perfect. The question is now, What will we do concerning the situation in Mexico? The gentleman from Indiana defends the present situation by asking, "Why did not the Republicans correct it while they were in power years ago?"

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not yield. The gentleman does not hit the point on any question.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a pertinent question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly; if it is pertinent.

Mr. GARNER. What would the gentleman's remedy be for the present conditions in Mexico?

Mr. MANN. I am not called upon to state what my remedy would be.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman has stated that certain conditions exist, and I agree with him that some remedy, if possible, ought to be applied.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that every remedy has been applied? If the gentleman will answer that, I will answer his question.

Mr. GARNER. When the gentleman states what he has he ought to have some remedy in mind himself.

Mr. MANN. Not necessarily. I frequently call attention to evils without attempting to specify the method of correcting them. I have not reached the point, like the gentleman from Indiana, where I think I know it all.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MANN. If it is a pertinent question.

Mr. MOORE. I think it is. Did this condition of things which the gentleman has described in Mexico prevail during a Republican administration?

Mr. MANN. They did not; but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman admit that he has no remedy?

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to admit that I am not the administration. I do not have the executive authority, and I can not undertake to say what I would do if I had that authority. Does that help the gentleman? But if I had the authority, I would find a way of correcting these evils. [Applause on the Republican side.] There are the evils—executions, murders, starvation, famine, rapine, throughout the land of Mexico. We are preventing anyone else from obtaining order there, and we have not as much nerve in the present Department of State upon this subject as would supply an angleworm. [Applause on the Republican side.] It may satisfy some gentlemen to say that we can not do any better. If we can not do any better, then we ought to withdraw our assumed power over Mexico. We have no moral right to say that anarchy must continue to exist in Mexico, and we are responsible before the world to-day for the deplorable conditions existing there. If there were a proper conception of our duties, we could easily—yes, easily—bring order out of chaos, and that without war.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois in what consists our assumed authority in Mexico?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think it is necessary to go into that. Everyone knows that we assume the authority. We do not let any other nation exercise jurisdiction there.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. MANN. For what?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. For a question.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. This is not asked except in good faith, I assure the gentleman, and speaking of our failure to take cognizance of the matters existing in Mexico, the gentleman has just said that we have refused——

Mr. MANN. That is not a question.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Oh, the gentleman will not be too facetious. I would like to frame my question.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman has said that we will not permit others to bring about a remedy there. That being the case, how would that involve us as to the Monroe doctrine, and what would be the gentleman's position with reference to that doctrine?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of maintaining the Monroe doctrine; that is the Monroe doctrine. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not in favor of abandoning Mexico to anarchy in Mexico or to control by European Governments. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, in to-day's morning papers appears an article stating that the administration had protested to Great Britain against its policy of seizing neutral vessels with neutral goods consigned to neutral countries. If the statement is true that a sharp protest has been made—and I say if the statement is true, and I hope that it is true—I commend the administration for taking the action that it has. I agree entirely with the proposition that it is the duty of this country to keep out of entangling alliances in connection with the European war, but I do not believe that because that is true we ought to resign all of our rights on the seas to foreign countries. England has been persistently seizing neutral vessels containing neutral cargoes consigned to neutrals in neutral countries, carrying those vessels and their cargoes into her own ports. I know of one instance where a vessel was seized on the 5th of November, a long time ago, which contained perishable goods. It is still lying in an English harbor; and I am glad that the administration is now taking the position that we have our rights on the seas, both as to England and as to Germany, and as to all of the other countries which may be involved in this war. [Applause.] We do not intend, in order to keep out of the war, to say to warring nations, "You can do what you please, without regard to our rights or international law, with our goods on the high seas." We have rights. There is not any danger of our getting into war because we stand up for those rights. England can not afford to war with us; neither can Germany; and neither country will insist upon seizing our property contrary to the rules of international law, and I hope the administration will insist that we have the right to ship goods in neutral vessels to neutral countries and preserve our rights abroad. They have no moral right to destroy all of our commerce. It may be that some of the nations would like to destroy American commerce while they are destroying the commerce of each other, but we must uphold our rights upon the high seas with dignity and with firmness. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a little time yet remains for general discussion of the Post Office appropriation bill. I desire to use a few moments in which to discuss the difficulties which confront the Postal Service in the outlying portions of the extreme Northwest. I call the attention of the committee to the post-road map of the State of Washington. I feel sure the Members will be surprised to learn that a considerable portion of the letter-carrying service from this point in Clallam County, at the extreme northwest of the United States, clear down below this great forest reserve—the Olympic—and below this great Indian reservation—the Quiniault—through this more or less settled country to the city of Moclips, has entirely broken down.

The extension of the parcel post, while a great blessing generally, has been fatal on mail routes in the mountains. Pioneers away out yonder, who can keep in touch with the world only by means of letters and papers, now receive neither. Time was when the mail carriers came through once or twice a week, regardless of storm or condition of road. Now they come no more. Their bids for carrying the mail, including the 50-pound packages, are so high that the department declines to accept them.

For instance, the lowest bid for carrying the letter mail and parcel post on the route from Taholah to Elk Park, 45½ miles, was $12,000 a year. Note the fact that Taholah is in the Indian reservation and Elk Park is in the great forest reserve. Also that this route offered the only connection for getting mail into all of southwestern Jefferson County. Now, then, the department says:

The sum is entirely out of proportion to the importance of the postal facilities to be afforded by the route, particularly in view of the requirement of law that the Postmaster General should have due regard to productiveness in the establishment and maintenance of star routes.

Mr. Chairman, the little offices along that route are not particularly productive. That is true. The productiveness is at the other end—out in the United States generally—where parcel-post packages originate. This particular route was broken down with 50-pound packages, and while sometimes there was a shortage of packages there never was a shortage of catalogues from mail-order houses, each catalogue as weighty as a piece of hickory stove wood.

The business for these little outlying offices originated outside and broke down the routes, so that now the pioneers away out there, far from the beaten lines of travel, receive neither letters, newspapers, nor packages by mail. They are again victims of the march of progress, just as they were victims when the great forest-reserve blanket was thrown over them, destroying their chances for development, progress, more population, good roads, schools, and churches.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while the Government holds the land and the timber in the sacred name of conservation, these citizens who heeded the call "Back to the land" are denied that boon which this Government has gladly given since Ben Franklin founded the Postal Service—the free delivery of letters.

Last summer the Interior Department had workingmen in that country and paid them $3 a day and board, and also paid well for horses and their keep. In that country the Forest Service maintains a pack train, paying $1 a day per horse, furnishing feed, and giving the owner of each horse $75 a month.

Now, then, consider that the unfortunate Indian, Toby by name, who had the contract to carry the mail into western Jefferson County the other way—via Forks—began by carrying the letters and papers on his back, and going as a runner for 30 or 35 miles. Then, when the 12-pound parcel post was introduced, he bought an old gray horse, and when 50 pounds became the limit of weight he kept on adding horses, until when he threw up his contract he found himself riding his old horse and leading six others, all for the original price. He had to ford Hell Roaring Creek—rightly named, by the way—and had to unpack the mail from the six pack horses and swim them across the Bogachiel River, then carry the mail across the footbridge and repack the horses—all for the original mail-packet price.

When Indian Toby quit his bondsmen endeavored to keep up the route. The next man who tried it had a sad experience. W. P. Elliott, of Pins, writes:

Since the expiration of the last contract, June 30, 1914, we have no mail carrier. Parcel post nearly ruined the contractor during his contract term and forced him to mortgage his homestead and finally to throw up the job. As a result, all bids tendered the department are too much above the former figures for a new term and the department seems loath to accept any of the new bids offered.

Mr. Elliott, by the way, offers to carry the route at considerably less than paid by the Forest Service for men and pack horses, and to accept pay only per number of horses needed. Mr. Elliott now travels 18 miles for his own mail.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. About how large a population occupies the counties the gentleman is describing?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I should say that in these vast country districts, covering portions of three counties, there are something like eight to twelve hundred people who are staying on the land and who wish to see the country prosper and develop.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Considerable of a rural community there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and they appreciate not only the mail, but the parcel post. It is not their fault that the roads are not better. The United States Government itself owns most of the land there, and withholds it for far distant generations.

Parcel post, before the routes there collapsed, gave these people a market. Why, they shipped out dressed hogs, cut in halves or quarters; they shipped out butter, and goodness knows what. Now they send no mail at all, and get none at all, and are met with the charge that their little post offices are not productive.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it your theory that the parcel mail obstructs the first-class mail?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; in these cases the weight has broken down the routes to the outlying communities.

Now, in other localities in my district the Government has saved the situation by making double contracts; that is, one contract for letter and paper mail and another for parcel post. For instance, on the daily route from Morton to Lewis, 34 miles, the carrier receives $3,333 for carrying the mail proper and 2 cents a pound for all parcel-post packages—that is, $40 a ton.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman whether this is a rural or a star route?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Star route, with a rural-route attachment. Patrons hang their outgoing mail on forked sticks, in small waterproof sacks, and the star-route carrier drops small sacks along the route with the mail for patrons. The bulk of his freighting business—parcel-post freight, if you please—goes from town to town.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I would like 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed and is in control of the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield the gentleman an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is this carrier making 34 miles every day?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; 34 miles a day.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Have you any figures on the route that runs out of Clallam Bay?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Is not there one which runs from out to a place called Quillayute Bay?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; that is the route which connected with two roads, twice-a-week routes, one down into the forest reserve.

Mr. FITZHENRY. And you say that route is 34 miles long?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not know what the length of that route is. It looks as though it were about 25 miles long.

Mr. FITZHENRY. And that carrier receives $3,300?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; that pay goes to another carrier over in a much more thickly populated section of the district.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Has the route to Clallam Bay been abandoned?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; it has not been abandoned, but its connections have been.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Well, I would not carry mail on that route for $3,300 a month.

Mr. BORLAND. In which is the failure, the star routes or the rural routes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In both, I think; but principally in these outlying star routes. The territory is, of course, rough; it is sparsely settled, and the Post Office Department—ever since parcel post was introduced—has labored earnestly to solve the problem; so has the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I am pleased to say.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that one of these carriers received $3,300?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. One carrier on a rural route receives $3,333 per year for carrying letters and papers and 2 cents a pound for parcel post.

Mr. COOPER. How long is that route and under what circumstances is this mail carried?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is 34 miles long.

Mr. COX. What is the average weight of the mail carried?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I can not say. The letter and paper mail, I presume, amounts to three or four sacks daily. The carrier receives $3,333 for carrying that, and he receives 2 cents a pound on all parcel post which he carries.

Mr. COX. What is the total weight?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It varies, of course. It runs into tons. A big wagonload daily, over 34 miles over as good a road as the people—already overtaxed—can provide, but, withal, as poor a road as man ever permitted to be called by the special designation "good road."

Mr. COX. Does not he get that salary now under the new appropriation for rural routes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not think he does.

Mr. COOPER. I want to find out something about this carrier——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, we are discussing him. He certainly earns his pay.

Mr. COOPER. I want to find out about him, because it is the most extraordinary statement. In my country when they say a carrier has 25 miles to travel it means 25 miles out and 25 miles back.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He has a route 34 miles long and 34 miles back; what is known as a double route. He keeps horses at both ends of the route, and relays besides.

Mr. COOPER. But he does not make it in one day over that route.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, yes, he does.

Mr. COOPER. Sixty-eight miles?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. He makes it in one day. He starts very early in the morning and gets back very late at night. He earns the 2 cents a pound paid him for hauling parcel-post freight, even if the Government receives only 1 cent a pound. The Postal Department is prosperous. It shows a surplus. What it loses on this route it makes on others. I contend that similar double contracts should be made on all hard, mountainous routes, not only in the State of Washington, but in all of the States from the Rocky Mountains west. I hold that if it is advisable to appropriate a liberal sum, as is done on page 25 of this bill, for mail-carrying emergencies in Alaska, it is also advisable to appropriate extra money for emergency mail carrying in each of the 11 so-called public-land States, where the Government holds—withholds—many of the principal resources.

Further, it is proposed in this bill to put the straight rural routes on a contract basis. Under such a plan bids in the West will either be so low that the successful bidders will be unsuccessful in attempting to live and pay for horse feed, or the bids will be so high that the post-office officials will refuse to accept them, and the hard, outlying rural routes will be like some of these star routes—as dead as Hector. Remember, a heavy incoming parcel post and a small outgoing mail on a route is supposed to be bad business from the standpoint of a Post Office Department that schemes to show a profit, as if the postal system must be a business proposition rather than a convenience to all the people.

Mr. Chairman, while we have the outline map of Washington before us, permit me to call attention to two or three things that are tending to diminish the incomes of these outlying offices.

Here [indicating] is a great national monument, comprising 600,000 acres. No mining or prospecting permitted in there. Strike away that unnecessary monument and you will open the way for the development of great tin mines—probably the greatest in the United States.

Here is the Olympic forest reserve and here are river valleys all through these slopes. Open these valleys to agriculture.

Here is British Columbia, from whence was shipped to Puget Sound a few days ago the largest raft of logs ever put together—dumped on a broken free-trade market. And yet some persons have the effrontery to say that the Underwood tariff bill has not hurt that country.

Here are the Straits of Fuca, into which come ships bringing free butter, made in Australia's summer to sell in our winter, and ships from China bringing eggs to further make it harder for these pioneers, these frontiersmen, to extract a living from the tracts that a generous Government has given them, where they live without electricity, without railroads, and now without that greatest boon of all—the United States mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, when the Post Office appropriation bill first came up several days ago and a rule was presented from the Rules Committee making certain proposed legislation in order in that bill I voted against that rule.

My reasons for this vote are, first, that one of the proposals made in order was a wholesale cutting down of salaries of postmasters and certain other officials named in first and second class post offices and the entire abolition of the offices of assistant postmasters. The other was a proposal providing for an interference with the rural carrier service. I do not undertake to say that the matter of these salaries of postmasters and their heads of departments ought not to be readjusted. Perhaps they should. At all events, if this had been the only trouble I might not have voted against the rule, though I doubt the wisdom of making the sweeping reductions proposed in this rule. Nor do I think assistant postmasters ought to be abolished. In many of the offices they are necessary and ought to be retained. I have never believed, however, that they ought to be under civil service, but, on the contrary, believe that they should be appointed by the postmasters. If their services in any way have become ineffective, it is because of the ridiculous idea that placed them under civil service. The idea that a postmaster, especially of an important office, is obliged to have an assistant chosen for him, who holds his office independently of the postmaster, is one that I do not think commends itself to any reasonable person, unless that person has an ax to grind. Naturally the Republicans desiring to perpetuate themselves in office put in the system and would like to continue it, but when they put these offices under civil service they rendered them practically of very much less value than they were before. I would much have preferred a rule providing that these assistant postmasters be appointed by their chiefs, or certainly appointed on his recommendation.

RURAL CARRIER SERVICE.

Another proposal provided for by the rule was the experimental contract system of rural-route service.

I am opposed to any interference with the rural-route service, and I voted against the rule on this account. I wish, first, to quote from the last report of our able Postmaster General, when he says, on page 6:

> The service has been administered for the convenience of the public, not for profit.

And again, on page 7:

> The Postal Service may not be operated wholly upon lines of private enterprise.

In addition to this, as shown by this same excellent report, and we know from other sources, never in the history of the department has there been such a successful and efficient service as we have now, and probably for the first time in its history it is on a paying basis. Why, then, this sweeping reduction in salaries of officers and a desire to change the rural-route service to a contract system? The rural-route system is the especial pride of the department and of the country. It is one of the most important factors, if not the most important factor, in building up and making pleasant country life. Its educational advantages can not be overestimated. It has done more to ameliorate and make happy the life of the rural resident in the last few years than all other causes put together. It has done more to give him and his children educational advantages than any other cause except, perhaps, public schools, and in many instances its educational value is greater than that of the public school. It has put the rural resident in regular and daily touch with all the rest of the world. It has given him a new interest in life. It has relieved him from that personal isolation which makes for deterioration of both moral and mental strength. Seeing every day what his farmer neighbors from all parts of the country are doing, it encourages his ambition to achieve better results on his own farm. He is kept in closer touch with city life, and accordingly becomes more familiar with its wants and necessities. He knows better what to raise for sale. He is made familiar with the markets and knows better how to supply them. He is taught the advantages of diversifying his crops. He learns the immense saving in raising all his own food supply at home. He soon finds that he may easily raise just as much staple crops, like corn, wheat, and cotton, and yet at the same time raise cattle, hogs, sheep, poultry, vegetables, fruits, and berries for home consumption, and even for sale in home markets. The parcel post, conducted by the same rural carrier, gives him a market for anything he may have to sell direct to the consumer at a larger price, and a ready means of obtaining anything he might want to buy at a lower price. No one who has never lived in the country under the old conditions and in the country under the new conditions, with rural-carrier service as we now have it, can understand the untold blessings and advantages that come from the successful building up of this service and what its efficient maintenance means to the country resident.

In the last few decades there has been a tremendous influx to the cities from the country districts, greatly to the detriment of the whole country. Without this rural mail service that influx would have been vastly greater and the damage caused would have been vastly more. We must not let it be interfered with except for better reasons than an anticipated lessening of expense.

RURAL CARRIERS.

I know many rural carriers. They are intelligent, honest, honorable, industrious, accommodating, and polite. They live in the open air. They see many people every day, and are, or soon become, good mixers. They take great interest in their work. They take a great interest in the people along their routes. They are good citizens, good neighbors, and good friends. The installation of the parcel-post system has added greatly to their labors and responsibilities. They are all advocates of good roads. They are advocates of better education. They are advocates of rural development. They are advocates of diversified farming. They are advocates of home industries. They are advocates of local markets. They are advocates of direct exchange between producers and consumers, without the expense of middlemen. They are for all these things because it is in their direct interest so to be. Their salaries are—to some extent, at least—dependent upon the business they have to do and the business done along their route.

They come from the communities which they serve. They represent the best and most enterprising element of their several communities. They form a leading part in their own local life. They mold in a large degree the local thought. They are influential in religious, in moral, in social, and in the business life. They stand well because, as a rule, they come from the best people and because they represent and are looked upon as representing the great Government of the United States.

The Government picks the best men for this service. They have to stand competitive examinations. They have to be educated and honest and straight. They have to be first-class men in every respect. They have to be reliable, sober, and energetic men. They perform one of the greatest economic functions of our national life, and they perform it so successfully that every thinking man is proud of the system and of them.

WHY THE CHANGE?

Why should we change this system that has worked so well? Simply because it may be done cheaper? As stated before, our Post Office Department—certainly under its present most excellent management—does not intend that it should be run for profit. Of course the department wants and we all want to get the best service at the lowest price. But will a change to a contract system bring this about? I do not believe it. I believe it will be a false economy to try it. I do not believe we can get any satisfactory results from a rural contract system. It is true at present we pay our rural carriers well. It is doubtless true they make more in this service than they could make in any other rural work; but, as stated before, they are picked men; they ought to have more for that reason. They ought to be paid well as long as they so successfully perform their duties. Let us cut down expenses in some other way, but not at a place where it will hamper and injure the most effective service that the Government is now doing. The rural carrier has won his place in our economic life by merit. Let us render to him his just due and not take away from him that which he has made.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, as if the European war did not afford enough sensational news, there have been sent during the past week by newspaper correspondents at Manila or from some other source dispatches that must have put the nerves of many readers in this as well as in my own country to a severe test. I refer to the current reports of an uprising among the Filipinos.

It is my purpose to call the attention of the House and of the American people to the true nature and purpose of these reports. A review of them will furnish a fair idea of what the so-called revolt now announced really is. On December 18 the following telegram was printed in the New York Herald and elsewhere.

MANILA, Thursday.

American and foreign business men here express the fear that the promises contained in the Jones bill providing for a measure of independence for the Philippines might lead to an uprising of the natives.

This dispatch is very significant, because it at once affords the means for an interpretation of the other dispatches. We are told, in effect, that in the opinion of the American and foreign business men in the Philippines there will be an insurrection there should the preamble of the Jones bill, which contains this promise of independence, be approved by the Senate, where the bill is now pending. Who these American and foreign business men may be we are not told; why they fear an uprising of the natives should the islands be promised independence we are left to guess. Only one thing is apparent from the dispatches—the Senate is advised to strike out the preamble of the Jones bill lest it produce a revolt among the natives. As to this I desire only to note that if there is one feature in the Jones bill that meets with practically universal approval on the part of the Filipino people it is the preamble of the bill. Why, then, should they revolt if the Congress of the United States should satisfy their desire? I do not suppose that the correspondent of the Herald or his informants—if he had any—will ever be able to give us any adequate explanation of so absurd a conclusion.

But let me continue: At the time this dispatch was sent from Manila there was as yet no apparent sign of impending revolt; there was only the assertion that revolt would ensue upon the passage of the Jones bill, provided it contained a promise of independence. At the very earliest this bill could not get through the Senate before the month of February, so that we who had been forewarned of this impending outbreak could not look for the threatened trouble before that time, and then only in case the preamble had not been defeated in response to the suggestion contained in this dispatch.

Alas! On December 21, just three days after the above-referred-to dispatch saw the light in this country, the New York Times published the following cablegram:

Soldiers arriving from Corregidor Island report that two companies of Scouts there have been disarmed and that American soldiers have been supplied with full ammunition. They allege that a plot has been discovered to free the prisoners and start an uprising.

The military is silent, but the wildest rumors are current.

Many other newspapers published this same story, some of them with such details that the War Department deemed it necessary to inquire of the Governor General what truth there might be in these dispatches. Consequently the department sent to the Governor General the following cablegram:

Special dispatch to New York Herald, December 17, reports threatened revolt Filipinos. Special dispatch New York Times, December 20, reports two companies Scouts on Corregidor Island have been disarmed, and that plot has been discovered to free prisoners and start an uprising.

To which the Governor General answered:

Referring to telegram from your office of 21st instant, no foundation whatever known here for either report.

It thus appears that neither the dispatch to the New York Herald nor that printed by the New York Times had any foundation in fact. How could such a disregard for truth be possible? In the dispatch to the Times we are given the number of companies that have been disarmed and the place where the attempted uprising took place, and yet there was not even a shadow of foundation for the whole thing. But this is not the worst. After the American authorities at Manila—the Governor General and the commanding general—had officially denied that there had been any attempt on the part of the Scouts to make trouble, those who sent these messages to the newspapers I have quoted, instead of honestly acknowledging their misinformation, sought to make the American public believe that they told the truth, but that the military authorities were concealing it, as can be seen from the following cablegram published in the New York Tribune of December 24:

MANILA, December 23.

Trustworthy but unofficial reports declare that Artemio Ricarte is in the Philippines directing the seditionists. Tagalogs, it is stated, are drilling openly, and Cavite is a hotbed of revolutionists. Gov. Gen. Harrison is taking no action, but the military authorities are preparing for an outbreak. The infantry at Manila are sleeping on their arms. It is denied by military officers that they have discovered a plot among the Filipino Scouts on Corregidor Island, under Ricarte's direction, to liberate prisoners, seize the treasury, and send money to Hongkong to finance a Philippine revolt. The report, however, is credited by others. The government has issued arms to civilians on Fraile and Carabao Islands.

This cable reiterates the alleged plot among the Filipino Scouts, and asserts that while it is denied by the military authorities, "the report is credited by others." Can any reasonable person fail to recognize the unfairness—nay, the evident malice—of this dispatch?

It is to be noted not only that in this latest report the story of a plot among the Scouts is reiterated, but that other more alarming news is given. "Artemio Ricarte," it is asserted, "is in Manila directing the seditionists. The Tagalogs are drilling openly, and Cavite is a hotbed of revolutionists. Gov. Gen. Harrison is taking no action, but the military authorities are preparing for an outbreak. The infantry at Manila are sleeping on their arms."

Mr. Chairman, I must pause here for an instant to sound my most energetic protest against the infamous suggestion contained in this telegram, that Gov. Gen. Harrison is guilty either of criminal negligence of his duties or of disloyalty to his own Government—the Government of which he is the official representative in the insular administration. Such a suggestion as this should provoke the just indignation of every self-respecting American. While I am a Filipino, and while, as everybody knows, I advocate early withdrawal of American sovereignty over the Philippines, yet so long as the American flag is there I owe allegiance to that flag, and therefore I resent this cowardly and absolutely baseless aspersion upon the integrity of the man who represents this Nation in my country.

But the New York Tribune is not the only newspaper which has been furnished such news. On December 23 the New York Times submitted to the Secretary of War the following cablegram which had been received by it from Manila:

Riot guns are being distributed to American civilians on Carabao and Fraile Islands, and 100 rounds, with full equipment, has been distributed to soldiers in Manila. Barrels supposed to contain cement were shipped to Corregidor and found to contain bolos. Two native scout officers and companies were disarmed and confined in Corregidor.

The plan was to free prisoners by a sudden night attack, overpowering scout guard and capturing the island. The day was fixed for between Christmas and New Year. In the past few months there has been notable increase so-called boy scout organizations, composed mostly of grown men, drilling throughout Manila Provinces.

Thereupon the Secretary of War, on December 24, sent to the Governor General the following cablegram:

New York Tribune publishes cable to-day from Manila announcing preparations military to prevent carrying out plot followers of Ricarte for insurrection and disarmament two companies scouts at Corregidor and armament civilians in the islands in Manila Harbor. New York Times has cable as follows:

"Riot guns are being distributed to American civilians on Carabao-Fraile Islands, and 100 rounds, with full equipment, has been distributed to soldiers in Manila. Barrels supposed to contain cement were shipped to Corregidor and found to contain bolos. Two native scout officers and companies were disarmed and confined on Corregidor. The plan was to free prisoners by a sudden night attack, overpowering scout guard and capturing the island. The day was fixed for between Christmas and New Year. In the past few months there has been notable increase so-called boy scout organizations, composed mostly of grown men, drilling throughout Manila Provinces."

New York Times says the above information was received on high authority. Publication of this was probably suppressed because of strong statement of the Secretary of War to Washington representative of New York Times.

The Secretary of War desires to know whether there is any foundation whatever for reports of this character, recently become frequent.

While the War Department was awaiting the answer of the Governor General practically every newspaper in the United States published, on December 26, the story that an outbreak had taken place in Manila on Christmas Eve.

Let me read one of these stories:

REVOLT PLOT IN THE PHILIPPINES WAS SERIOUS—10,000 FILIPINOS IN MANILA PLANNED TO ATTACK FORTS—OUTBREAKS IN THE PROVINCES.

MANILA, December 26.

Eight Filipinos have been arrested on the charge of sedition as a result of an abortive rising in Manila and its environs Thursday night. Further arrests are probable.

From Army sources it is learned that a general warning was sent to all officers Thursday afternoon that fully 10,000 Filipinos in Manila alone were ready for a concerted attack on Fort Santiago, the Cuartel España, the Cuartel Infantería, and the medical depot.

Military units were immediately prepared, and a street patrol was started at dusk.

Constabulary agents who are members of the secret societies disclosed the plans for an uprising, thus enabling a force of constabulary and police to disperse gatherings at Bagumbayan, Paco, and Navetas, near Malabon.

SAILORS FIGHT WITH CHAIRS.

At Caloocan a squad of American sailors seized chairs when a force of Filipinos approached a dance hall in which they were gathered and, using the chairs as weapons, routed the Filipinos, of whom quite a number were injured.

The rising was evidently poorly organized and lacked leaders. It was composed mostly of persons implicitly trusting Artemio Ricarte, a revolutionary, who conducts a continual propaganda from Hongkong, to which he was banished by the American authorities some time ago.

Ricarte, it is said, advised that the anti-American attempt be made on Christmas Eve, when American officers would be celebrating the holiday.

Reports from the Provinces tell of minor risings and occasional violence, but details are lacking.

SITUATION WELL UNDER CONTROL.

The situation to-day, from all appearances, and according to official statements, is well under control.

In more or less the same language this story was printed in many newspapers and was apparently taken very seriously by many editors, since it called forth editorials pointing out the unwisdom of enacting at this time any measure granting more self-government to the Filipinos and looking toward independence. This result is exactly what the authors of these dispatches have been trying to accomplish. In order to influence American public opinion against any liberal legislation for the Philippines they told of uprisings said to be probable if such legislation should be written into the statute books; then, of a plot of scout soldiers, of the arming of civilians by military authorities, and finally of an actual general revolt said to have occurred on Christmas Eve.

I have already demonstrated that both the civil government and the Army headquarters have denied that any plot on the part of the scouts has been discovered, and that there had been any arming of civilians. Let me now analyze the character of this general outbreak, as disclosed by the story itself as I have read it. The dispatch says that "fully 10,000 Filipinos in Manila alone were ready for a concerted attack on Fort Santiago, the Cuartel de España, the Cuartel de Infantería, and the medical depot." This sounds like a very serious uprising, does it not? Ten thousand Filipinos ready for a concerted attack on all the garrisons at Manila! And yet note the statement of the paragraph immediately preceding, which says: "Eight Filipinos have been arrested on the charge of sedition as a result of an abortive rising in Manila and its environs Thursday night." Eight Filipinos arrested! What became of the remaining 9,992 rebels? Does not the arrest of eight men point rather to some infraction of a municipal ordinance—a common occurrence anywhere, especially on Christmas Eve—than to a general rebellion?

Let us examine another paragraph:

At Caloocan a squad of American sailors seized chairs when a force of Filipinos approached a dance hall in which they were gathered, and using the chairs as weapons routed the Filipinos, of whom quite a number were injured.

Mr. Chairman, how it is possible for any man with common sense to give serious credence to such news of revolt as this is beyond my comprehension. Think of it! Rebels picking out as their point of attack a dance hall and are met and repulsed with chairs by the dancers. The whole thing should be considered a joke, were it not for the serious consequences that stories of this kind might sooner or later bring about, unless the originators be unmasked. Do the writers of these stories realize that what they say is a reflection upon the Government of the United States? What has become of your work in the Philippines, proclaimed as altogether good, if after 15 years of American administration you are likely almost any day to be confronted with a revolt there? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman want more time?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes; if I could have more I should appreciate it very much.

The CHAIRMAN. How much more time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from the Philippine Islands is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. QUEZON. What has become of your police organization said to be so magnificent? What has become of the proclaimed beneficence of your Government in the Philippine Islands if it does not at least serve to establish there an orderly government?

Mr. Chairman, the Governor General, after these stories had been published, responded to the cablegram of inquiry from the War Department as follows:

Referring to telegram from your office of the 24th instant, Army headquarters state there is absolutely no truth in the reports about Corregidor, Carabao, and Fraile alleged occurrences.

On Christmas eve there was a small and unsuccessful movement in Manila, connected with the Ricarte campaign. Ricarte has for several years conducted from Hongkong revolutionary propaganda, appealing to the most ignorant classes of Filipinos, and selling through his agents in the islands commissions in his so-called army for sums from a peseta to 10 pesos. During the past three months five of the Ricarte leaders have been arrested and sentenced to four and six years, including Ricarte's right-hand man. It has been regarded as a grafting scheme under a revolutionary guise, but from time to time arouses excitement among uneducated classes.

Christmas eve about 75 men, extremely ignorant, without firearms, met at the Botanic Garden in Manila and were dispersed by the municipal police without disorder, except that three shots were fired into the air by police and 20 men arrested. Eight of the latter were held upon the charge of carrying concealed weapons—knives and bolos. Nobody was injured, except one man shot by a policeman later in the night in another part of the city when he attacked policeman with bolo.

Movements of similar character occurred at Navotas, 10 miles from Manila, where about 40 men assembled and endeavored unsuccessfully to loot municipal safe, taking provincial governor prisoner, who afterwards escaped uninjured. Twenty of this party captured by constabulary or municipal police.

Ten men with two firearms in Laguna de Bay attempted to make trouble last night, with no results. Everything quiet now and vigorous attempt will be made to secure leaders, chief of whom believed to be man under sentence of imprisonment for homicide who has jumped his bail. Nobody of any standing or influence is concerned in this movement.

Mr. COOPER. What is the date of that?

Mr. QUEZON. This was sent from Manila on December 27. The Governor General, I say, after reiterating his previous cable advice regarding the lack of foundation for the earlier stories about a scout plot in Corregidor and the alleged arming of civilians on the Carabao and Fraile Islands, goes on to explain what happened in Manila on Christmas eve. He says:

Christmas Eve about 75 men, extremely ignorant, without firearms, met at the Botanic Garden in Manila and were dispersed by the municipal police without disorder, except that three shots were fired in the air by the police, and 20 men were arrested. Eight of the latter held upon charge of carrying concealed weapons—knives and bolos. Nobody was injured except one man shot by a policeman later in the night in another part of the city when he attacked policeman with bolo.

It is thus seen that the "revolt" in Manila, wherein 10,000 Filipinos were to take part, according to newspaper reports, consisted, after all, in a gathering of "75 men without firearms," according to the cablegram of the Governor General. The police fired three shots into the air, and the rebels dispersed without disorder. Eight men were arrested on the charge of carrying concealed weapons.

What kind of a "revolt" is this that can be dispersed by three shots in the air, without disorder, and in which the rebels are without arms? As to the eight arrested men who were charged with carrying concealed weapons, it must be noted that in the Philippines the police could, if they chose, put into jail the whole population of the archipelago on the charge of carrying bolos and knives, because practically all of the laboring people carry either knives or bolos as a tool. This fact is well known to everybody familiar with Filipino life, and there is no law in the Philippines prohibiting the use or carrying of knives or bolos. Who, knowing the location and nature of the Manila Botanic Garden, could believe that would-be rebels would pick out as a gathering point this open and central place, where people go for their daily walks or rides? The Botanic Garden is like the parks in the United States—a common place of resort. I have seen thousands of people in that garden without their being interfered with by the police. Why this unusual apprehension at so small a gathering? Why should the police fire shots in the air to disperse the assemblage? Evidently these rumors of uprising have been circulated to the extent of exciting the nerves of the police, and at the sight of 75 men together an officer lost his self-control, thought it was time to be ready for the worst, and started firing into the air. How ridiculous! It must be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that this deplorable incident took place on Christmas eve, when, even in the United States, the municipal police is obliged to check disturbances of public order, except that here no one thinks of revolt. But in the Philippines some one had plainly made up his mind to find a revolution, and lacking better ground for his stories took hold of these insignificant police affairs to justify his desire to show that there was a revolution. Now, a word about Ricarte, the alleged head of this conspiracy. Ricarte is in Hongkong now, not in Manila, as stated by these reports. He has been carrying on his propaganda for many years. Governors General Wright, Smith, and Forbes all knew of it. And to show that there is absolutely nothing new in this matter, let me quote a part of a cablegram sent by Gov. Gen. Wright to the Secretary of War in 1904. It is as follows:

He is now reported to be in Ilocos Norte, and having followed closely. Am satisfied that he can accomplish little. Times and Cablenews are trying to make a great sensation, and have probably sent wild telegrams to the United States, hence detailed. With the exception indicated everything wired as usual.

So the game is not new. Sensational stories of this kind have been reported in the past on the part of some people in the Philippines as handy means to accomplish certain purposes. Never, Mr. Chairman, since American occupation, have the Filipino people been so convinced of the high purposes of this Government toward them as they are now, and therefore never has there been so little discontent as there is now. As I recently said to the representative of a newspaper in this city, who asked me about this revolution, if every American soldier were taken away to-day from the Philippines, we, the Filipinos, would defend the American flag against possible invaders. [Applause.]

The policy of President Wilson, the policy of Gov. Gen. Harrison has made of every Filipino a real friend of the United States. We know that we need not despair; that our national ambitions are on the road to realization, and we are not going to do the very thing that alone would defeat it. We know only too well that a revolt on our part against the United States would mean the ruin of our country, the slaughter of defenseless and innocent men, women, and children. For these reasons, if for no others, I say, these stories of revolution are the most outrageous falsehoods that could be invented. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I find myself in many respects quite in accord with the gentleman from the Philippines [Mr. QUEZON], who has just spoken. I can indorse a great deal that he said, especially if I am permitted to add a few words. Like him, I have minimized the reports of an insurrection in the Philippine Islands. Like him, I do not believe the intelligent people in the Philippine Islands are now working for a revolution or an insurrection or in any way countenancing it. Like him, I know that anything like a revolutionary propaganda in the Philippine Islands to-day would be absolutely destructive of the best interests of the Filipinos, and many of them know it. Unlike him, however, I can not close my eyes to certain things of near moment and grave concern disclosed by these reports. But no final opinion should be formed upon the fragments of information thus far available, and I join with Señor QUEZON in eagerly awaiting that more complete information, in time sure to come, advising us of the exact nature of this insurrectionary movement, informing us of the names of the leaders and the extent of the disaffection. But without waiting for another word of information I can indorse what he said and what Gov. Gen. Harrison said, that no distinguished, leading Filipinos were implicated in the movement, and I do not for one moment believe they will be. Nevertheless we should not close our eyes to these disturbances. They are not to be cast aside with a joke and a sneer. They have a serious, mighty serious, aspect, and we must meet these facts as they are. I say this with all the sincerity I can command, having regard to the interests of the Filipinos themselves.

A sporadic insurrection in the Philippine Islands is nothing new to this season. It is nothing new to this administration or to this year. Even while I was there, but little more than a year ago, across the bay at Zambales, in the mountains, 65 men or thereabouts started an insurrection with two shotguns. They called it an insurrection. They were all rounded up and captured and taken to prison, but most of them let out, because they were simply misguided individuals; and I could only think of the time when I myself as a boy joined some neighborhood boys and ran away. We stayed away one whole night, but came back hungry in the morning. This so-called insurrection is not indicative of anything nation-wide or fundamentally of grave concern, but is indicative of the fact that certain classes of the Filipino people are very easily aroused, easily misled, and easily made to play a false part by designing leaders. Not infrequently during past years there have been seditious movements, sporadic, local, with no well-defined purpose, all of which have been easily put down and more or less smiled at, because there has been a strong, stable, protecting Government ever since the American occupation. This is not the first occurrence of late. Two months ago a Filipino servant notified his employer in Manila of a definitely planned insurrection. The papers in this country have said not a word about it. Secretary Riggs took prompt action, placed constabulary in the disaffected region, and quashed any possible revolutionary spirit before it really burst forth. The Governor General, Mr. Harrison, ordered the constabulary home peremptorily, saying the alleged uprising was a joke. Recent events disclose that Secretary Riggs was right and the Governor General was wrong. A short time ago the administrative people in the Philippine Islands were shocked when there occurred what you might call an insurrection at the Iuahig penal colony on the island of Palanan, where honor prisoners of Bilibid are grouped as colonists. There have been several of these insurrectionary ebullitions during the past few months. I think they teach an important lesson. The lesson is important to our Democratic brethren especially, but I do not suppose they will take it strongly to their hearts. After I came back from the islands, a year ago, I said on numerous occasions that there would be work for the Army of the United States and for the scouts and the constabulary in the islands within about a year unless some things were stopped. I find that what I said has come true.

It is important for us on this occasion to consider what the things were, the forces then observed, that in my opinion should have been stopped. One of the things that was notorious and that ought to have been stopped was the spreading broadcast among the people of a disrespect for the American flag. You can not call it anything else. When this administration got into full swing there was unconsciously given to the people the idea that to criticize, to belittle, to arraign, to condemn, to cry out against that which had been done by the American Government in the islands was to display good judgment and an easy way to win favor with the new authorities. I have heretofore called the attention of the House to this important fact. The inevitable result was that Filipinos lost respect for American sovereignty. This loss of respect has manifested itself in many press utterances and has now found expression in sporadic and puerile insurrection against our authority. No particular harm was done as long as the new spirit was confined to the educated, the self-reliant, and the self-contained, but all harm followed when it was utilized by renegade rascals like Ricarte, inflamed and infuriated, spreading in and utilized in a revolutionary propaganda. This man Ricarte has been carrying on this propaganda for several years—he and others like him. He was deported because he refused to recognize or obey American sovereignty. Formerly the work of this man and those of his ilk has been easily suppressed by a vigilant and efficient constabulary, who form a very effective military body. Nobody paid much attention to these little ebullitions. The men engaged in the work never got very far; they were apprehended and amputated from their beguilement of the simple-minded native into the treacherous avocation of a revolutionist. But recently, during the past year, Ricarte's men, and others engaged in the same business, have been very much more active, have grown vastly bolder, have seized the anti-American feeling begotten by the policies and utterances of this administration when it was first instituted, seized hold of this wanton spirit, directed its activities, and brought forth an insurrection that really requires immediate and vigorous attention.

The other lesson taught by this incipient insurrection is more important yet. Of late in the islands all men seeking election to any political office, either important or insignificant, have been preaching independence. The people engaged in political activities have taken their cue from their leaders like Señor QUEZON and Señor Osmeña, and have vigorously promised the people to work for independence. Furthermore, these candidates for office have promised the people that when the Democratic Party secures control of the American Government Philippine independence will at once follow. Independencia immediatiste has recently been preached with redoubled vigor. It was my belief when I left the islands that real trouble would follow consequent upon this. They greatly overtrained in their independence talk. In fact, I told some of the leaders I believed trouble would follow. It would follow because they knew and I knew that the Democratic Party would not, could not grant independence to the islands during any period near at hand. Furthermore, immediate independence would be shunned like the plague by the leading, thinking Filipinos if there was real danger that it might come at once. So it seemed to me then that when the ignorant among the Filipinos, who had been so liberally fed on independence promises, found there was to be no redemption of those promises now their disappointment might not be curbed except by the use of force. That is exactly what happened. Disguise it as you will, there has been keen, bitter disappointment among many Filipinos, especially in and around Manila, over the failure of the Jones bill, now pending, to grant independence outright. The better class of Filipinos are not among them; the real able leaders of the Filipinos are not among them; they are almost devoid of leadership, hardly armed at all; but outbreaks of this character may be expected in different parts of the islands.

There is another lesson we should not overlook. We here all minimize this insurrectionary movement; and why? Because there is in the islands and over the islands to-day a strong, stable, beneficent Government, that will protect life and property, that will preserve peace—the Government of the United States. Were that Government not there, what chaos might result.

I was very glad that the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON] to-day did not repeat what he is credited in the press as saying, that this insurrection—if you want to call it that, although I do not wish to dignify it by too vigorous a name—has been stirred up by American interests in the island hostile to Philippine independence.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. QUEZON. If I am credited with having said that, it is not so. I said that these reports were inspired by business men or business interests.

Mr. MILLER. I accept the gentleman's correction. Very likely what he has stated is the true statement that he gave the press. But I am glad that the gentleman did not repeat even that, because I know that he does not believe it now after the information that has been received from Gov. Gen. Harrison. Such a statement is more ridiculous and more absurd than it is to say that this is a general insurrection of all Filipinos, trying to force Philippine independence. Both are absurd. It is utterly unthinkable that any American or American business interest would encourage any such enterprise. Such a statement is a gratuitous insult to the public spirit and the loyalty, both to Filipino welfare and to the honor of America, possessed by these men in such an eminent degree. It is also utterly unthinkable that any foreign business institution or interest would engage in any such business enterprise with such a disreputable reprobate as Ricarte or people of that character and kind. Nor have these interests in any way been instrumental in circulating the reports that we have received. Let the President, or anyone, make that statement at his peril. It has no foundation, in fact, and can rest only upon conjecture. But the truth will be known. While I do not think it ever will be shown that this movement is particularly serious or consequential, yet I venture it will be found that the facts thus far published will be found short of the truth.

I do not believe that this movement should have any particular effect on the passage of the Jones bill one way or the other, excepting as to the preamble of that bill. But I do believe that it indicates that the people who are implicated, the unlettered class—for no other group of people would gather as it is indicated they did and engage in the things they did unless they were ignorant and unlettered—are easily misled. It also indicates that we should be careful as parties and as a Nation not to promise that which we can not and should not give, and that while we are in the islands, whether for a year or forever, that while American sovereignty is there, it shall have respect and loyalty from every soul it benefits and protects. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, there appeared in the Washington Times to-day a statement by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH], chairman of the national congressional committee. It is a very wise and patriotic statement, and I ask to have it read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

HINEBAUGH IS FOR REUNION IN 1916 VOTE—SAYS BY THIS MEANS ONLY CAN REACTIONARIES BE DRIVEN OUT OF REPUBLICAN PARTY AND DEMOCRATS DEFEATED—IN STATEMENT ISSUED TO-DAY PROGRESSIVE LEADER POINTS OUT COOPERATION OF MOOSE AND RADICALS IN CONGRESS.

Advising members of the Progressive Party to unite with progressive Republicans in the 1916 campaign, to the end that the reactionary element of the Republican Party may be "cleaned out," and the continued domination of the country by the Democratic Party prevented, Chairman Hinebaugh, of the Bull Moose congressional committee, to-day gave out a statement.

Chairman Hinebaugh's statement undoubtedly will be considered by many politicians as pointing to a return to the Republican Party of the great bulk of the Bull Moose voters.

Mr. Hinebaugh does not believe that, under all the circumstances, it is for the public welfare for the Progressive Party to continue as a separate organization in the 1916 campaign.

WANTS WILSON DEFEATED.

He declares the reelection of Wilson and the Democratic Party "would not be a good thing for the country." He wants the Bull Moose voters and progressive Republicans to unite their forces, thus making the Republican Party subject to the control of the progressive Republican element and men of progressive views. He points out that Progressive Party men and progressive Republicans are practically one in their views, and can stand on the same platform.

Chairman Hinebaugh says the decision of the recent conference at Chicago to continue the Progressive organization was wise, but as to what shall be the ultimate object of that organization opinions may differ.

His statement is as follows:

"Personally I believe the Progressives who were lifelong Republicans—and 90 per cent of them were—should join with the progressive Republicans in the next fight, and clean out what is left of the reactionary element in the Republican Party, and thus compel the adoption of a progressive platform and the nomination of progressive Republican candidates to office.

CITES HIS REASONS.

"There are many substantial reasons for this view. First and foremost, the welfare of the people should be considered. The continuance of the Progressive Party as a distinct organization could have but one result, in my judgment, in the 1916 campaign, and that result would be to greatly increase the chances, if not insure the reelection, of Wilson and the Democratic Party.

"It is my judgment, based on my experience in the Sixty-third Congress, that such a result would not be a good thing for the country. Then, again, the record shows that on all matters of important legislation the Progressives and the progressive Republicans voted together, demonstrating beyond question that they think and believe alike.

"Again, the result of the recent primaries and election shows that if the Progressive voters had gone into the Republican primaries the old guard would have been defeated.

"The Progressive who left the Republican Party in 1912 can unite with the progressive Republicans and secure the results for which they both stand. Under separate organizations and divided at the polls, neither will be able to accomplish in a constructive way their ultimate objects, and the common enemy will win control of the Government.

"The rule of the minority, made possible only by a divided majority, where that majority has practically a common purpose can not result in working out the best interests of the people."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I have on several occasions addressed at the desk criticisms of the Underwood tariff law on account of discrimination against the producers of the country. I ask to have read in my time a statement by the biggest Democrat of the biggest Democratic State in this country, Gov. Colquitt, of Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

The administration's tariff law was pledged to lower the cost of living, and it has had the contrary effect. By putting raw material on the free list and keeping the protective tariff on manufactured goods it has condemned American farms by the hundreds of thousands to peonage, and has enabled the manufacturers, getting their raw materials cheaper, to charge higher prices for their goods, which they have done.

Hides were free listed, and shoes have gone higher. This is true of virtually every single item similarly treated in the administration tariff law. The American farmer gets less for his raw materials, the American workingman pays more for the finished product, and both are robbed to further enrich the protected manufacturing trusts and combines.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOON. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 19 minutes.

Mr. MOON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] caused to be read a statement from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH], a purely personal statement, in reference to the Progressive Party, and a possible reunion with the Republicans. That statement carries only the present view of Mr. HINEBAUGH. There are certain kinds of reunion that may possibly be on the boards. We Progressives might possibly go aboard the Republican ship under certain conditions. You know the Revolutionists went on board a British ship on a certain occasion. They did not care so much to find themselves beneath the British flag, for they went on to throw the tea that was on that vessel overboard into Boston Harbor. If it be possible for the Progressive Party members to go back into the Republican Party with ax handles and baseball bats in their hands to put out of business the old machine that dominated the party at Chicago and put Progressive men and women in charge of that ship, then the Progressives of the country might think about the matter. If the terms of surrender were satisfactory, we might accept.

It is evident from the reading of the article submitted by the gentleman from Michigan, who is himself a member of the Republican Party, that he figures that there is a reactionary element in the Republican Party that needs just that kind of treatment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does not the gentleman from Washington believe that that is true of all parties? And I ask the gentleman if he has not felt that there is a reactionary element in the Progressive Party also?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, no doubt there is some reactionary spirit in the Progressive Party and in every party in existence to-day.

Since the Hobson prohibition amendment was voted upon, however, I think the Progressive Party is more likely to maintain its integrity and to continue to be a fighting force and a triumphant force in this country than ever before. The roll call the other day and the proceedings here on this floor showed that the Democratic Party is wet from the head of the party, the President, on down; that is, President Wilson is wet on any proposition involving prohibition as a national or State-wide question, according to the citations from his pen and according to the words of Mr. HOBSON in the debate the other day. In our recent campaigns for State-wide prohibition in the States of Washington and Oregon it was President Wilson's influence for the wets that gave us the most trouble. His letters were published against us, and his portrait was posted in all the liquor centers as opposed to prohibition.

The Secretary of State, Hon. William J. Bryan, was quoted here on the floor by Mr. HENRY, of Texas, a strong administration Democrat and chairman of the Committee on Rules, as having declared against national prohibition and having voted against State prohibition in Nebraska. Mr. HENRY said he himself was opposed to prohibition nationally and locally. The able leader of the Democratic Party on this floor [Mr. UNDERWOOD] took a position against prohibition. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. FITZGERALD, of New York, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, Mr. POU, of North Carolina, and other leaders, including Mr. DOREMUS, of Michigan, chairman of the congressional committee of the Democratic Party, almost the entire Texas delegation, the Boston Democrats, and the Tammany Democrats of New York, all took that position plainly and clearly, and showed that the party as organized is as wet on national prohibition as it could well be.

If that is true of the Democratic Party, the record shows that the Republican Party is water-logged, or liquor-logged, on the subject.

The President of the United States who retired when Mr. Wilson took his seat, President Taft, vetoed the Webb bill, which was the plainest and fairest kind of a demand of the prohibitionists of this country for justice and the right to put the traffic out of business locally and for legislation which passed this House finally over his veto. Then the able leader of the Republican Party on this floor, Mr. MANN, of Illinois, took his position the other day against the amendment, and earnestly and vociferously fought it. The so-called Progressive Republicans, led by Mr. LENROOT, of Wisconsin, were against the amendment.

The Prohibition Party platform has only one fundamental plank in it that the Progressive Party has not, and that is national prohibition. In a few days there is going to come up the question of woman's suffrage in this House, if it is not successfully choked off, and again the Progressive Party membership in this House will go on record as it went on record on roll call on the Hobson resolution on December 22, with all except one for prohibition of the liquor traffic. The Progressive Members will go on record unanimously for equal suffrage. I believe that with prohibition added to the Progressive platform we will have a permanent force of Progressives, Prohibitionists, suffragists, and public-ownership adherents that will have more strength in this country than either of the other parties, and we have a leader who is no more afraid of the liquor traffic than he is of African lions, party bosses, or big business, and who has already gone into Ohio and Michigan and campaigned against the liquor traffic, thereby supporting Progressive platforms which declared for prohibition, and I believe we are going to whip both the old parties and carry that amendment through under the Progressive Party.

The suffrage issue will prove an important factor. The women's clubs all over the country are against the liquor traffic and most of them are for equal suffrage. Add prohibition to the Progressive Party platform and let the Prohibition and the Progressive Parties join forces with the women in the game and it would be some fight. It would be a crusade; party lines would be forgotten. Political meetings would become religious gatherings. A great revival of justice would be the result, and the majority in the House of Representatives, as shown by the roll call the other day, would be repeated when the roll was called in the electoral college. We would elect our candidates and put the liquor traffic out of business forever in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether he has any desire to occupy what time remains to him?

Mr. STEENERSON. No.

Mr. MOON. We have only one more speech on this side, and the gentleman who was to make that is not present. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] be allowed to place some articles in the RECORD on subjects that have been discussed here this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] be entitled to place in the RECORD certain articles. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by "articles"?

Mr. MOON. Some newspaper articles, I think. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] went over to his office to bring them here and he wanted to read them in the debate.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to any Member reading in the few minutes he would have in general debate whatever articles he desired, but I think we had better wait until he gets here.

Mr. MOON. Very well. I will ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel and miscellaneous expenses in the Postal Service, office of the Postmaster General, $1,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], who has returned, may address the House for five minutes on a subject not now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I sent the following article to the Washington Herald for publication. It has not yet been published. I will read it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 27, 1914.

On the way down to my office this morning I bought a Washington Herald. On the front page, in large letters, I read "Colquitt dons war paint; flays all Wilson's policies." At the door of the House Office Building I met an Oklahoma Democrat. "Your governor is mad," said he. "Yes," I replied; "he has for some time had Wilsonphobia." I was present at Dallas, Tex., about two years ago or more when Mr. Wilson, then Gov. Wilson, upon invitation, delivered an address at the fairgrounds. Our governor seemed to me to have the "phobia" then, and I think has had it ever since. If the crash of worlds and the end of time were at hand, Gov. Colquitt would see in it nothing but the work of President Wilson and the Democratic tariff law. Of course he is given front-page headlines by papers hostile to Democracy and may be quoted to impress the people of other States with the idea that the great Democratic State of Texas condemns the President and the present Democratic Congress. People outside of Texas do not generally know that our governor was foaming at the mouth in just the same way when our last Democratic State convention met and most heartily indorsed the President.

The simple truth boiled down is that our governor thinks he is a great figure, and perhaps would like to go to the Senate, and he must make a big noise. Also he must catch onto some special interests. Also, to boost himself, he must be loud in his denunciation, even if the denunciation does make white black and black white, and assume that all the people are ignorant of what all the people know. All the people save perhaps our governor know that the greatest and most desperate war of all time is being now fought, involving directly half the population of the world, and that as a result of that war there is a vast surplus of our cotton beyond the demands of the market, while there is a greater demand than supply for foodstuffs, and all the world save our governor knows that this would produce low prices for cotton and high prices for foodstuffs.

Informed and intelligent persons know that hides being placed on the free list did not raise the price of shoes. Such persons know that when hides were put on the free list the duty on shoes was also absolutely taken off, and they also know that taking the duty off shoes could not have raised their price. Yet that is the inference "our governor" seeks to have his readers draw. Every leading Democrat in the South for the last 40 years has declared that the Republican tariff on corn and wheat was a fraud intended to delude the farmer into becoming a protectionist, yet "our governor," in the face of the fact that corn and wheat now sell for more than ever, and were higher even before the war in Europe than under the Payne law, says, "The American farmer gets less for his raw material." Our governor also charges the President with our low price of cotton because he allowed England to make it contraband of war. This charge is amazing, or perhaps I ought to say would be amazing if made by a sane person. Then he charges that the repeal of that part of the Panama act which exempted our coastwise vessels from payment of tolls was a weak surrender to England, and that but for that repeal hundreds of foreign-built ships would have come under our flag to get the benefit of the exemption and carried our goods—cotton—to foreign markets. Apparently he did not know that the exemption law which was repealed was only an exemption from payment of tolls for our coastwise trade in which those foreign-built ships were forbidden to engage; that our ships in the foreign trade either of export or import were never given exemption from tolls. The trouble is that so many of Mr. Colquitt's readers may know no more on this subject than he does. Then he denounces the administration for seeking to buy some ships in which our cotton might be carried to foreign markets. "Spending the taxpayers' money," he says, "buying a subsidized national shipping service." If he had been paid by the shipping combination to do it, he could have made no argument more to their liking. It is true that the administration wanted Congress to authorize the buying of ships in which to carry our goods to foreign markets under our present conditions of distress and dearth of vessels to do this carrying. It was proposed to let the Government buy ships wherever they could be bought cheapest and use them to help out our foreign transportation service for which we have practically no privately owned merchant marine flying the American flag.

If the measure had passed, these Government-owned ships could and would have carried much of our cotton to foreign markets at reasonable prices and not at $15 per bale as is being charged by the shipping combination now. Speaking of a shipment of 6,500 bales of cotton from Galveston to Bremen, the Washington Times of yesterday says editorially:

> Entirely aside from the importance of resuming the export of cotton to Germany interest attaches to this shipment because of the freight rate on it. The owners of the cotton will pay, despite that it is not a war risk, $3 per hundred pounds, whereas a year ago the charge would have been just about 10 per cent of that rate. The reason is said to be the scarcity of shipping to handle the business of the world.

"Our governor," however, is more concerned to denounce a Democratic President than to denounce the extortions of a shipping combination or to try to help our people who are charged such enormous rates. It is worth noting, but not answering, that "our governor" denounces the President's Mexican policy. We in Texas well understand that if "our governor" had had the power he would have plunged us into war with uphappy and stricken Mexico. Let those who feel with him be content. There ought to be enough war in Europe to satisfy them. "Our governor" is dissatisfied with everything the present administration has done and has not done, and to its doing or not doing he charges everything he complains of from the high price of shoes and beefsteak to the low price of cotton. He can not quite trace the revolution in Mexico or the war in Europe to the President's door, but he can do nearly as well. He can show that all ills that come to us from them come by way of the White House. After some reflection I am persuaded that the real point and purpose of "our governor" was to convince the people of Texas that had he been President we would have had no 6-cent cotton. All the rest of his denunciation was thrown in for good measure and because it chimed in with his general hostility to Wilson. Surely, if as President, he would have given us 10 or 11 cent cotton he ought to be made Senator. Meantime, being governor, he has done or tried to do nothing sensible about the matter. I do not wish to assume the rôle of "denouncer" myself, but I do wish to say that in my opinion had the governors and legislatures of the cotton-growing States gone about it in earnest to arrange to issue State bonds with which to buy the surplus of our 1914 cotton, as advocated by me in a speech at Corsicana, October 31, and then put a tax on all cotton grown in 1915 and provided for State aid by way of purchase of seed for other crops for those needing but unable to buy such seed, and in that way relieved our present cotton market of its surplus, discouraged the planting of a big cotton crop, and encouraged the planting of other crops for next year, much could and would have been done to help our people. The bond issue and buying of our present surplus cotton is now a dead issue, but it is still opportune to urge that all cotton States discourage cotton growing next year by a tax on it and encourage planting other crops by wise State aid. In 1877 Minnesota had a grasshopper plague, and in 1878 she passed a law for the borrowing of money by the State with which to buy seed grain to be furnished to her farmers who needed it at cost. I believe that almost any European Government would take similar steps under our present conditions. "Our Gov. Colquitt" has had his busy "storm-tossed" day in office and is now about to step down and out, but may I not urge our several governors and legislatures to consider the suggestion I have made.

RUFUS HARDY,
Sixth District, Texas.

DECEMBER 28.

I see the Herald of to-day, in front page, first column, parades Texas, under the leadership of Gov. Colquitt, as heading revolt against Wilson.

R. H.

Mr. Chairman, I ought not to take my seat without remarking that the Washington Post, which carried "our governor's" denunciation of Mr. Wilson, carried also, so I am told, a letter to the President from the National Manufacturers' Association demanding the repeal of the Democratic tariff law, notwithstanding "our governor" declares that by putting raw materials on the free list we have robbed the farmer and enriched the manufacturer.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting in the RECORD the newspaper article written by Gov. Colquitt, of Texas, to which reference has just been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the address of Gov. Colquitt referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that has already been inserted to-day, and if it has I do not see any need for inserting it twice.

Mr. MANN. It has not been inserted. There was just a little extract of it inserted.

Mr. HARDY. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For compensation to postmasters, $30,750,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we had first better finish the reading of the section.

Mr. STEENERSON. Perhaps the amendment would come in just as well after the proviso.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it comes properly here. That is where it was before.

Mr. STEENERSON. The amendment proposes the existing law, providing pay for assistant postmasters, which is omitted.

Mr. MOON. I suggest that we first read the section, and then take the matter up. I desire to offer an amendment myself.

Mr. MANN. I think that it ought to come in here.

Mr. STEENERSON. We have not debated that proviso, and it is new legislation and made in order by this rule. I desire to offer it now.

Mr. MOON. I do not desire to object to the gentleman offering it, but I think we had better understand the way amendments are to be offered. I think the better and orderly way would be to wait until the section is read and then offer amendments. However, I shall not object.

Mr. MANN. It is in order at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 8, on page 5, insert the following:

"For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, 5, at not exceeding $4,000 each; 42, at not exceeding $3,000 each; 10, at not exceeding $2,500 each; 5, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 16, at not exceeding $1,900 each; 45, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 95, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 150, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 180, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 150, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 350, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 560, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 525, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 300, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 130, at not exceeding $900 each; 100, at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $3,200,000."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill as reported and as it is before us omits——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if his amendment is identical with existing law?

Mr. STEENERSON. It is—omits entirely to provide for the assistant postmasters and this amendment is simply the existing law proposed to be inserted in the proper place. The existing law first provides for the payment of postmasters' salaries, and then for assistant postmasters' salaries; and this bill as reported leaves out entirely assistant postmasters, upon the theory, we are told, that they are going to provide them new places under different designations, as additional superintendents of finance, superintendents of mail delivery, etc., who will perform the duties now performed by the assistant postmasters. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that proposition. I do not believe that it is in the interest of the service. The Postal Service, above all others, requires training and experience. We all know that since the present administration came into power there has been a great many changes in the personnel of first and second class postmasters. Probably within a short time, if the hopes of ardent advocates of Democracy are fulfilled, all experienced postmasters will be retired to private life and the only trained and experienced men left at the head of affairs in the first and second class offices will be the assistant postmasters. Now, you may think that this perhaps only affects the incumbents, but in a larger sense it affects every person who has any business with the post offices. It is of the utmost importance to the people that an efficient Postal Service should be maintained. With all due respect to the present administration, I want to say right here that complaints are coming to me as a Member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads as they never have come before of the service now being rendered. In some places the complaints are similar to the complaints made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], that the first and second class mail is choked out and delayed by the freight business. In other places it is the inexperience of new postmasters and of incompetent men.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to have the gentleman explain how these assistant postmasters are to be cared for, and when?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am very glad the question has been asked, because if I can understand the situation it is proposed to reappoint these assistant postmasters, provided they are acceptable to the powers that be, but if they are not acceptable they will be retired. I predict that if this measure goes through——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEENERSON. I predict that if this amendment is not adopted and the assistant postmasters not provided for that a large number of them will be retired to private life. A year ago when the appropriation bill was up it was advocated without any concealment by the leaders of the Democracy that they wanted to abolish assistant postmasters. It looked a little like spoils, and it was criticized. At that time there was an affirmative provision to do away with assistant postmasters, which the chairman and a majority of the committee inserted in the bill, but they failed to get a rule to make it in order, and then ensued that memorable dispute between the leaders of the administration and the leaders of the Democratic Party on the floor on this question. They have since agreed upon this provision, which simply means to starve them to death, and it gives the administration the right to designate perhaps some of these assistants as superintendents of mail, finance, and the opportunity will be to discharge them or to leave them out of the service entirely.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the estimated saving in the proposition here suggested by the committee to take the place of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota? What will be the estimated saving yearly?

Mr. STEENERSON. I believe there is a little saving estimated, but the salaries of the supervisory employees provided for in the following section eat up all the proposed savings entirely, and it can not be defended on the ground of economy at all.

Mr. GOULDEN. Then, what is the purpose of making the change from the present law if it is not on the ground of economy or better service?

Mr. STEENERSON. Just one purpose, I believe, is to get offices for Democrats; that is one purpose——

Mr. GOULDEN. I can not agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. STEENERSON. It so looks to a man up a tree.

Mr. GOULDEN. I opposed that proposition last year. I am opposed to any interference with the civil service.

Mr. STEENERSON. I know the gentleman opposed it last year, and I think it was very creditable for him to stand up here for the merit system as he did, and I hope he will vote to continue this system and appropriate money to pay the salaries of these men.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman if these assistant postmasters, in order to secure the positions which the gentleman has named, will have to pass a civil-service examination again?

Mr. STEENERSON. Probably not, but they will have to be appointed and you know who makes the appointments, and I will guarantee there will not be very many Republicans appointed and you could not expect them to be. I hope that the proposition will be agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by my colleague on the committee, and I want to tell the committee why. To begin with, I think the Post Office Department ought to be run as a strictly business institution. Next, every assistant postmaster in the United States is provided for in this bill in some place where he will have work to do. Now, let us take for example an assistant postmaster in a second-class office. The present compensation to assistant postmasters in second-class offices amounts to from $800 to $1,400 a year. Every one of those men, if this provision of the bill is enacted into law, will be given some kind of a supervisory place or clerkship, and the bill itself provides for them.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment; let me explain the bill first.

And appropriations are provided in the sections following for every assistant postmaster in the service; not, it is true, as an assistant postmaster, but in some place of equal importance.

Now, the man who is an assistant postmaster to-day and getting $800 a year may be promoted to a clerkship in the office at $1,100 a year if this bill passes as it is proposed. The man getting $1,400 a year may be promoted to a place at $1,500 a year as superintendent of finance. Or, if the condition of the office and the lack of ability of the man is such that it would not be justified, he may possibly be reduced to a place not exceeding $1,100 a year. But in the whole reorganization provision is made for every man who occupies the position of assistant postmaster now. No civil-service examination will be required to retain this man in the service—not at all. He will go as a matter of right into the working force of the office over which he now presides as assistant postmaster.

There can be no politics in an item like this. It is strictly and purely a business suggestion. It can not be said that the department is doing an injustice to anybody when, as a matter of fact, it simply recommends a measure which will recognize the necessities of the operation of the great department over which the Postmaster General presides.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is it not also one of the purposes to require the postmaster himself to become more familiar with the work?

Mr. MADDEN. I was just coming to that.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Not now. When I get through with this I will answer any question connected with the work that may be asked of me.

The assistant postmaster is really the executive officer and the postmaster is merely a figurehead in many places throughout the country. The payment given to the postmaster is, in many cases, a gratuity for political favors done or expected. I am dealing with this question outside of politics. I am a Republican and I am for this proposition because I believe it is just and fair.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The postmasters work eight hours a day, do they not, now?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the recommendation of the committee, if adopted, will result in greater efficiency in the management of the Post Office Department. It will make the postmaster the executive officer of the post office instead of his assistant. It will compel him, as postmaster, to devote his time and thought to the business of the public, for which he is paid. It will give to the assistant postmaster the recognition to which his ability entitles him by placing him in a position of responsibility, and if this bill in its present form be adopted the Postmaster General or his First Assistant will see that no man is unjustly dealt with.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. The pay of the assistant postmasters of the United States amounts to a little over $3,000,000 a year. The saving by the reorganization proposed only amounts to $300,000, and that may well occur by reason of the fact that the man who is now getting $800 may go up to $1,100 per annum, and the man who is getting $1,400 may possibly go down to $1,300, although he may go up to $1,500 as superintendent of mails or as superintendent of finance. It will be the duty of the postmaster, if this bill shall become law as proposed, under a regulation to be fixed by the Postmaster General, to designate either the superintendent of finance or superintendent of mails as the acting postmaster in the absence of the postmaster. This will be a permanent designation. And it is the purpose of the department and the understanding of the committee that recommended this bill that wherever an assistant postmaster is qualified and the business of the office justifies it, he shall be appointed superintendent of finance or superintendent of mails, and that he may also be designated as the acting postmaster of the office.

Now, there can be nothing more fair than this. If the recommendation of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would result in the dismissal of these men from the service, I would be the last man in the House that would be for it. But it does no such thing. It not only does not dismiss them from the service, but it gives them absolute security of tenure under the civil-service law.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield now.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would just like to ask this one question: Does it provide for every assistant postmaster in the present office where he is serving?

Mr. MADDEN. It provides for every assistant postmaster to be cared for, and presumably in the office in which he now serves. It does not say so in the bill.

Mr. STEENERSON. It does not say anything in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. It does say this in the bill, namely, it provides for the number of men including the assistant postmasters, and the appropriation distinctly sets forth that a certain number of men of a certain class are to be provided for and that number includes the assistant postmasters. Now, what it does is this, namely, it increases the number of men beyond a certain salary 4,010, and 2,210 of these men are assistant postmasters, and 1,800 of the 4,010 increases are to provide for the ordinary growth of the department, so that there can be no claim based upon truth or justice that any man is to be driven from the place he occupies without having an equivalent provision made for him in some other place.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want just a moment on the question. I want to say to the committee that it is not the purpose of this bill to deprive any man of his official position. The department has the purpose to make two divisions of administration—the division of finance and the division of mails—and to fix the responsibility upon some responsible head as postmaster, and to eliminate the office of assistant postmaster as such. Yet the bill provides for superintendents of mails and superintendents of finance—positions to which these assistant postmasters will go practically at the same salary.

Now, they are not taken out of the service. They are not required even to take a civil-service examination, although they have never done that, as other employees of the department have.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Who has the power of making these changes from assistant postmasters to the positions of superintendent of finance and the superintendent of mails?

Mr. MOON. The Postmaster General has the ultimate control of it, as a matter of course.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. What assurance is given that the assistant postmasters, who are let out by reason of no appropriation, will be reappointed to any of these positions known as superintendent of finance or superintendent of mails?

Mr. MOON. It is only that assurance that you can have in the faith and confidence and honesty of the administration of a public officer. You could not have it under any other commission.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. No; not now. Let me go through with what I want to say, and then I will yield.

Now, a good many gentlemen think that the third-class offices, which are most numerous, are going to be seriously affected by this proposed change of grade and salary of postmasters. Well, this law does not touch third-class post offices at all. The table furnished by the department here shows that they are not even touched in any respect. In the second-class post offices—and I am discussing these postmasters' salaries in connection with it now—where the receipts are $40,000 the salary is $3,000 under the old plan. That is a first-class officer, and it is $3,000 in the new class. In the next four grades, $3,100, $3,200, $3,300, and $3,400, they are simply dropped, and the salary where the amount is between $40,000 and $60,000 of receipts is fixed at $3,000, and then where the amount of receipts is $160,000 the salary goes to $3,500. Then in the next higher grade, when receipts reach $340,000, the salary is $4,000 in the old plan, just as it is in the new. The material changes are in the larger offices that run between $1,000,000 and $13,000,000 of receipts.

Now, on the question of assistant postmasters, the department thinks it very proper and advisable that the office of assistant postmaster, as such, be not appropriated for. You know that under the general law that does not take that officer out of the classified service. It leaves him there to perform the supervisory duties that he now has the right to do under the classified service, but it fixes the responsibility in the postmaster and does not give a dual administration of the office in that respect. I do not know that I can do any better in explanation of this matter than to read what First Assistant Postmaster General Roper says.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOON. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOON. I read:

In enforcing the Postmaster General's requirement that every postmaster shall be the working executive of his office and perform service commensurate with the salary he receives, a long step has been taken toward the eventual classification of all postmasters. This consideration, together with the rapid extension of the two-division plan of post-office organization, forcibly suggests the desirability of abolishing the position of assistant postmaster. At the present time, under the regulations, every postmaster is required to appoint an assistant. At first-class offices the salary of the assistant postmaster is fixed by law at not exceeding 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster, graded in even hundreds of dollars from $1,500 up to $4,000, and at second-class offices the salaries are fixed at various sums, graded in even hundreds of dollars from $800 up to 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster. At offices of the third class where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900 a year, assistant postmasters may be appointed at a salary of $600 per annum. In offices below the first class postmasters are not in need of supervisory assistance, and as assistant postmasters in these offices usually perform only clerical duties their official designation should be changed accordingly. It is the intention of the department to reorganize all first-class post offices on the "two-division" plan outlined previously in this report, which eliminates the need for assistant postmasters. It is believed that in the interest of a more efficient and economical administration of the service the position of assistant postmaster should be abolished, that each first-class office should be provided with a superintendent of finance and a superintendent of mails, one of whom should act as postmaster in the absence of that official, and that at offices of the second, third, and fourth classes one of the clerks should be designated as a chief clerk and act in the absence of the postmaster.

With a view to effecting this important reform, this bureau in its estimates for 1916 has provided for all the clerical and supervisory assistance necessary, but has made no provision for the position of assistant postmaster. The proposal, however, does not contemplate the separation from the service of trained and efficient assistant postmasters, but to place and utilize them in the service to better advantage than heretofore.

Now, this is a plan for the reorganization of the department. There will be considerable saving effected by it. This question was asked of the First Assistant Postmaster General:

In case the committee should not decide to follow the recommendation of the department by abolishing the assistant postmasters, then state what appropriation you would recommend under the present system for the next fiscal year?

The answer was this:

For 1916 we estimated that the total amount would be $3,350,000.

Now, there is a pure matter of business. I do not want the House to misunderstand me as saying that the abolition of these offices would save that much money, perhaps, but inasmuch as those officials are retained as supervisory officials in the positions of superintendent of finance and superintendent of mails, the same salary would attach to those offices that now attaches to the office of assistant, except in some of the higher places of supervisory positions, and the net saving to the Government would be only about $300,000.

Now, there is an advantage in the plan beyond the amount to be saved. I know that gentlemen feel that they do not want a change of plan. They are conservative and do not want this reorganization. But, gentlemen, you can not administer this great department without leaving to the department heads and officials down there the discretion to administer it on business plans. I understand, too, that it is just as well to touch on that question openly and candidly. A good many gentlemen think that because a large majority of these assistant postmasters are Republicans they will be removed. But you are absolutely safe against such a conclusion under the existing law. If the department wanted to put these Republicans out, you know they could find a way to do it. When you were in power you did not have a bit of trouble to do that, and they do not have any trouble down there now when they want it done. It is only a question of expediency and a matter of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MOON. Yes; I will answer the question the gentleman asks me.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was going to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee if this was not one of the ways by which the assistant postmasters could be removed under this administration? The gentleman stated it could be done.

Mr. MOON. I think, under the law, it can be done without any change of law at all. Under the law it can now be done. You have got to trust this administration in order to secure the best results, and if you have in office a man under the civil-service law, no matter what the politics of such a man is, you can not turn him out unless he has done something that justifies you in turning him out, and you turn him out, after examination, as the result of a report.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Well, your examination of fourth-class postmasters, for illustration, was one way of getting rid of them.

Mr. MOON. I do not think we got rid of them.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. You got rid of a good many of them.

Mr. MOON. I am complaining very much personally, so far as my district is concerned, that the department down here give me a Republican every chance they can. They do it because they think the Republican is competent and fit for the place. I do not think they exercise a very wise discretion about it, but that is what they do.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In the first place, this bill abolishes the position of assistant postmaster.

Mr. MOON. Yes; and provides for the two-division plan, which is a new proposition.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That leaves the assistant postmasters who are now in the service without a job, does it not?

Mr. MOON. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the bill provide in any way for these assistant postmasters?

Mr. MOON. It provides for the money for the pay of these men and provides for the office of superintendent of finance and superintendent of mails, to which they can go.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But it leaves the discretion, does it not, to drop them from these positions?

Mr. MOON. It is bound to be left in the discretion of the department. We can not say here that these men shall slide into one office out of another.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We would like to say that, of course.

Mr. MOON. I know you would like to put into this bill the provision that nobody but a Republican shall hold the office of assistant postmaster.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. No. I should like to see the assistant postmaster assured of a place.

Mr. MOON. The supervisory service is fully protected in the creation of these two positions. The only question is whether this House is going to permit the department to adopt this plan, by which a more efficient service can be given to the country, and by which the postmaster may be made responsible as the head, without dividing the responsibility with the assistant under the law and with a reduction of expense.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Would you object to an amendment stating that these places that you speak of that are provided in the bill shall be filled by these assistant postmasters, so as to make it clear and certain that these places shall be so filled?

Mr. MOON. I do not want the gentleman to misunderstand me, as I am afraid, from his question, he does. I did not say that every one of these places was going to be filled by an assistant postmaster.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. That is the trouble.

Mr. MOON. I said the postmaster would have the right to determine who should fill the place, and that he would take the man best fitted for it, and that usually the assistant postmaster would be the best man. I have no doubt that in some places the assistant postmaster will not be the superintendent of finance or the superintendent of mails, but in the vast majority of post offices, on account of the knowledge which the assistant postmaster has of the service, I have not the slightest doubt that he will be appointed.

Mr. MADDEN. But he will get some place.

Mr. MOON. He is bound to get some place in the service, and he can not be demoted below his proper place.

Mr. STEENERSON. What authority has the gentleman for that statement?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Would it not be possible to send the assistant postmaster away from his home into some branch of the service entirely out of his environment?

Mr. MOON. I do not think there need be any change in the law to do that. They remove them now.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They could do it, but they are not doing it; but it would be possible to do that under this provision?

Mr. MOON. It can be done right now. There need not be any change in the law.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] will be adopted. In 1889 I had the honor to be appointed postmaster of the city of Camden, N. J., by President Harrison, and I want to say that I was no "figurehead" postmaster. I took charge of my office. I found, however, that a good assistant postmaster was a great help to me.

The assistant postmaster of a post office is under very heavy bond. He has charge of all the stock that is in that office, and he has practically the running of the office itself; and by that I mean the management of the office force. When you abolish his place and appoint him to another position are you going to reduce his bond and his duties as well as his salary? Because if that is to be done probably there will not be so much opposition on the part of the assistant postmasters.

In the absence of the postmaster, even if he only wishes to go away for a day at a time, or when his vacation time comes, the assistant postmaster can always take his place. I think the position of assistant postmaster should not be abolished. I think it is too important to be done away with. The assistant postmaster of my city said to me on Saturday last, when I was in the post office, "I have spent 20 hours a day in this office for the past five days." The postmaster there is not a figurehead. He is a recent appointee and a Democrat, appointed by the present administration, and he assumes the charge of his office. It is not a sinecure with him. He is there continuously attending to business; and yet, without the assistant postmaster, I am sure he would find it very difficult to run his office at anything like its present high standard. I think it is a great mistake to abolish this position and to appoint the assistant postmaster superintendent of finance or superintendent of mails and to say that he will really have the position of assistant postmaster. The plan would not work out satisfactorily; it is not consistent.

In most offices—I know it is true of the Camden, N. J., office—there is right now a superintendent of finance and also a superintendent of mails; so when the position of assistant postmaster is abolished the incumbents will not be appointed either superintendent of finance or superintendent of mails, as there will be a vacancy in neither of those positions. In my opinion, this is a well worked out plan to oust from civil-service positions such of these loyal and efficient assistant postmasters as happen to be Republicans.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will be adopted.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to this discussion for some time, and about as nearly as I can make out from the information we have received so far it is a change of name, but will not save the Government any considerable sum of money.

Now, in spite of all the talk that has been made on both sides of this aisle, it is perfectly apparent that the purpose is to get rid of these assistant postmasters, and that is all there is to the proposition, unless they happen to meet the approval of the powers that be. It is a proposal to remove them for political purposes. I am not now objecting to your doing that if you want to, but why not be fair and frank about it? What is the use of playing the hypocrite? You are not deceiving anybody on either side of the aisle by this performance.

Mr. MOON. I want to ask the gentleman what he means by that. I do not understand him?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I mean this, and I hope the gentleman can understand it. I mean that when you make a pretense that there is no politics in this I do not think you are being frank with the House. That is what I mean.

Mr. MOON. I have not attempted any pretense or to mislead the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I know you have not, and I honor the gentleman for it. It has been my province to know the gentleman well, to serve on a great committee with him, and I never knew the gentleman to be guilty of any false pretense.

Mr. MOON. I have stated the facts as I understand them and stated the facts as the department says they are, and I have stated, too, that in my judgment it was impossible to make a change.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman from Tennessee will not say that this will not result in the assistant postmasters being removed for political reasons.

Mr. MOON. Demoted, you mean?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Demoted and removed.

Mr. MOON. I think it will be done in some instances, and I say that it can be done now without this law.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The motive is to make it easier to do so and to remove the assistant postmasters under the pretense of economy.

Mr. MOON. No; no pretense of economy; the economy is demonstrated.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It has not been demonstrated.

Mr. MOON. I do not want the gentleman to misunderstand me, because if I had my way I would wipe out the 2,500 Republican assistant postmasters and put in 2,500 Democrats. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I honor the gentleman for his honesty, but I do not want gentlemen to pretend differently. That is the way the chairman of the committee feels, but some other gentlemen who are not quite so sure of their political ground try to deny it. That is what I am complaining about. I want you gentlemen to be frank and tell the truth and stop this hypocrisy, when the real object is to get rid of the assistant postmasters. If you intend to do this, say so.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman from Washington, for whom I have the highest regard and whom I honor as much as any Member of the House, that as a member of the committee, having given careful consideration to every question connected with this, it is my honest opinion that there is no attempt or desire to displace the assistant postmasters, except by taking away the title and transferring them to some other place in the department where they will be more useful than ornamental in the position that they occupy now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman show me any specific provision in the bill that will retain the assistant postmasters?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no specific provision that will do that; but if the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is answering in my time.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, the gentleman has no right to ask me a question and not let me answer.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman has answered it.

Mr. MADDEN. But I did not complete my answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to say in answer to my friend——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MADDEN. But I want to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, proceed briefly.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman asks me a question and insists on an answer, he must let me answer it in my own way.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will let the gentleman answer it, but I do not have to let him answer it in his own way in my time; he is mistaken about that. However, I will yield to the gentleman to answer briefly.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing on the face of the bill that indicates that these men who are assistant postmasters will be transferred except in the enumeration of the number of men required in the various grades in the clerical force of the department, the number now engaged as assistant postmasters are included, for example——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the gentleman to go any further; he went over that a while ago, and I heard the whole of it. I want to ask this question: Has the gentleman any objection to a specific amendment providing that these assistant postmasters shall not be dismissed except under the civil-service rules? He can answer that "yes" or "no."

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I will not answer it "yes" or "no."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to call the attention of my genial friend from Illinois to the fact that he made the statement that the postmasters of this country were practically figureheads and were appointed for political purposes. I do not want to misrepresent the gentleman——

Mr. MADDEN. The RECORD will show what I said.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I presume that this opinion arises largely from the fact that the gentleman from Illinois has never had any experience in the appointment of postmasters.

Mr. MADDEN. Thank God for that!

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It has been my duty to recommend postmasters for 200 or 300 offices. I know personally every postmaster in my district where there is an assistant postmaster, and most of them do more work than any clerk in the office and more than the assistant postmaster. After 12 years here in Congress, in the last campaign, of all these many postmasters I had recommended there was not a single complaint against any one of them. The same thing can be said of the Democratic postmasters appointed in my district. What higher tribute could be paid to any class of men? They are there performing the duties well and to the general satisfaction of the public. They are not simply figureheads. The gentleman from Illinois does not know that the Government requires each postmaster to devote so much time to the duties of his office.

Mr. MADDEN. I may not know it, but I know they do not do it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It may not be true of Chicago, but is true everywhere else in the country.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not true of Chicago either, for that is an office that it requires a genius to run.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I suppose it requires a political genius, according to the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MADDEN. No; there are no politics in the Chicago office.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman when he made that statement a while ago was a little bit prejudiced. I am afraid he was about as fair and impartial on that as he is when he says that it is not the purpose to remove assistant postmasters. The gentleman's statement about the postmasters makes me doubt his judgment on the other proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the rule excluded the provisions, in line 8, relative to the salaries of assistant postmasters. I want to ask the Chair whether or not a point of order has been made against that provision in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order has been made.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it is rather late for a point of order on any of this matter now.

The CHAIRMAN. The status is that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] has offered an amendment to reinstate the assistant postmasters.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed on this section in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not on the section.

Mr. MOON. On the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to close debate on the pending amendment at the expiration of five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. I object.

Mr. MANN. Let us see if we can not agree on time.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to have two or three minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, we have debated under the rule for quite a while on this, but I have no objection if other gentlemen desire to be heard.

Mr. MANN. We want 20 minutes more on this side.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed in 20 minutes and that the other side have 15 minutes of it.

Mr. MANN. I suggest the gentleman ask unanimous consent.

Mr. MOON. How much does the gentleman want?

Mr. MANN. We wanted 20 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Can the gentleman get along with 15 minutes?

Mr. STEENERSON. Twenty minutes on this side.

Mr. MOON. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate be closed in 30 minutes, 20 minutes to be given to the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of 30 minutes all debate be closed on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto, and that 20 minutes be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and 10 minutes by the chairman of the committee, Judge MOON. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get the parliamentary inquiry which I submitted to the Chair a moment ago answered. I asked as to whether or not any point of order had been made against the provisions in this bill commencing on line 8 and whether or not it is too late to make the point of order. As I understand it, they are reading this under sections, and there are four Assistant Postmasters General, which are dealt with by sections. This is under the head of the First Assistant Postmaster General. A rule was brought in here, as I understand it, amended, excluding this from the operation of the rule, and it would be subject to a point of order, if the point of order is not too late.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the point of order is not too late. They have not yet read the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The proviso has not yet been read.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I intend to make the point of order on the proviso.

Mr. HOWARD. I wanted to know the status of it.

The CHAIRMAN. We have read only to the end of line 8, and an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Minnesota reinstating the assistant postmasters, and the committee is debating that. There has been no point of order made.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] did not speak with his usual accuracy a few moments ago when he made the remarkable statement that postmasters are appointed as a reward for political services rendered or to be rendered, and that they are not expected to perform service and do not perform service. More recently, in a colloquy with a gentleman upon that side of the aisle, he said that he knew they did not perform services. The gentleman just thinks he knows, but really does not know. The fact is that under this Democratic administration the Post Office Department is getting a little bit too severe.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Just for a moment.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say that if I have said a word which reflects on anybody's integrity of purpose or upon his efficiency in the service I withdraw it now.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman would not reflect on anyone. In my district one of the best Democrats there is holding a postmastership, and within a week or two the Post Office Department notified him that if he did not cease devoting time to running a Democratic newspaper and devote eight full hours' time to the post office he would be removed.

Mr. MADDEN. Then, as a matter of fact he had not been devoting his time to the duties of the post office.

Mr. RUCKER. Ah, but the Post Office Department requires it, and he has to do it, and he is rendering the service now.

Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat inclined to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and think I should have done so if these gentlemen had not made me believe there is some politics in this bill. They have almost convinced me that this bill provides one way to get around that infernal humbug—civil service—and get rid of a few Republicans. I am not one of those the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] speaks of as being deceitful or cowardly. I am one who does not hesitate to say that I am now and have always been in favor of naming assistant postmasters and doing away with this humbuggery of civil service by which Republicans are kept in office under Democratic administration. I would get every one of them out before to-morrow night if I had the power to do it, and believing now that the language written in this bill will help get rid of some of them, if not all, I am inclined to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, though I was very much inclined to vote for it at first.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would not inject any remarks into this discussion at this time if it were not for the fact that a good deal has been said about the uselessness of assistant postmasters or the postmaster in case the assistant were a good and active man. In the district which I represent we have had a revision of our post office such as has been had throughout this country. We have reduced it from a five-division proposition down to a two-division proposition. Now we have but a superintendent of mails and a superintendent of finance, and both of those positions are filled by men now in the service. Nearly every first-class post office throughout the country is now upon that basis, and has those places filled, which makes it apparent that the assistant postmaster would not get one of those positions. I want to say at the present time we have a Democratic postmaster and a Democratic assistant postmaster, but it was not by operation of law. The Democratic assistant postmaster was appointed on account of the death of the Republican assistant postmaster. Both the assistant postmaster and the postmaster are live, up-to-date men, giving the city as fine a service as it is possible, and the Republicans who preceded them, both the postmaster and the assistant postmaster, were the hardest worked men in our city, and they made good, and they were both necessary. And I say it is just as necessary to-day that we have in our first-class post offices an assistant postmaster as it is necessary that we should have a postmaster.

Why, gentlemen, in that city, which is of small size, of only about 350,000 people, the assistant postmaster twice a month signs in the neighborhood of 2,000 checks, besides doing hundreds of other things that the postmaster would be tied down in doing. It seems to me it would be unwise on account of the fact that it may be possible to retain a Republican assistant postmaster under a Democratic régime. Now, it is just as possible that we may retain a good Democratic assistant postmaster under a Republican régime.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, this reform has been recommended by the Postmaster General. It is the duty of the Postmaster General—and he has an opportunity as well—to understand the details upon which he makes this recommendation. If it is our duty to understand them, for the most part, it must be said it is a duty we can not perform. A knowledge of the details of all the activities of the Government now are quite beyond the reach of any one man, and if as legislators we are able to pass upon general principles we have discharged our duty very well. I want to say that, in my opinion, from such experience as I have, that if there is any weakness in the postal institution as a working organization it is a weakness which springs from not giving it the same liberty of action that is accorded the other great industrial institutions of our country.

And this brings me to the principal recommendation of the Postmaster General, charged with the very greatest importance, not only to the postal institution but, as I believe, to all the people of the United States. I quote from his recent report:

POSTAL TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

The Postmaster General renews the recommendation embodied in his last annual report that Congress seriously consider the question of declaring a Government monopoly over all utilities for the public transmission of intelligence, and that steps be taken as soon as practicable to incorporate into the postal establishment the telegraph and telephone systems of the country.

In that report reference was made to the anomalous condition in this country under which the telegraph and telephone utilities, being vehicles for the public transmission of intelligence, infringe upon a function reserved by the Constitution to the National Government. They inherently, as well as constitutionally, belong to the Postal Service. That it has been the policy of this Government to ultimately acquire and operate these electrical means of communication as postal facilities, as is done by all the principal nations, the United States alone excepted, is evidenced by the fact that the first telegraph line in this country was maintained and operated as a part of the Postal Service, and, further, by the act of July 24, 1866, which provided for the Government acquisition of the telegraph lines upon the payment of an appraised valuation, and again by the act of 1902, which directed the Postmaster General "to report to Congress the probable cost of connecting a telegraph and telephone system with the Postal Service by some feasible plan."

The firm conviction of the department is here reiterated that telegraph and telephone service is inevitably monopolistic and, when operated under private control, does not render the maximum of public service at the minimum cost to the whole people.

It is an interesting fact that, whereas policies of government have been advocated and some adopted, the constitutionality of which have been seriously questioned, the principle of Government ownership and control of the telegraph and telephone finds its greatest strength in the Constitution. This opinion has been shared by practically all Postmasters General of the United States, who have held that the welfare and happiness of the Nation depend upon the fullest utilization of these agencies by the people, which can only be accomplished through Government ownership.

It is therefore recommended that early action be taken by Congress looking to the accomplishment of this end.

ECONOMIC PRINCIPLES.

[Notes from 1 to 21 are given in the appendix.]

Mr. Chairman, in approaching the subject I propose to present to the House to-day, the telegraph and the telephone agencies of the country, it is appropriate, I think, that they should be treated not as mere ephemeral incidents of legislation, but with a view to those more fundamental truths which determine our actions in disposing of the most serious problems of government.

What is the relation of the public and the post office to the telegraph and the telephone, those great agencies of communication between the people, which now eclipse the postal system in the taxes levied upon national communication?

Do they differ from the post office in the function they perform; and if not, how do they differ from industrial activities consigned by general consent to private control? Is there something in their nature which distinguishes them from the farm and the retail store, some difference which reaches the dignity of a principle of classification, assigning one to the domain of postal action, while leaving farm and store to the field of competitive control?

Mr. Chairman, there is a science of political economy; it speaks with an authority, not to say with a thoroughness of analysis and breadth of view, which I could not claim. It speaks, too, with a responsible sense, a knowledge of those perplexing varieties and complexities of modern society and industry. It knows that society has never governed itself well by utilizing merely a single truth or principle, whether it be laissez faire, unqualified individualism, socialism, or communism; that society is not a one-idea or a one-fingered institution, but that it possesses aspirations and appropriate organic attributes and powers which it is its duty to utilize to promote its welfare. Now, what does it say on the subject before us, first as to the natural division defining those activities which should and those which should not, on economic and social grounds, be assigned to the control of the individual? I quote from the work of Prof. Adams, "The State and Its Relation to Industrial Action":

CLASSES OF INDUSTRY.

All industries fall into three classes, according to the relation that exists between the increment of product which results from a given increment of capital or labor. These may be termed industries of constant returns, industries of diminishing returns, and industries of increasing returns. The first two classes of industries are adequately controlled by competitive action; the third class, on the other hand, requires the superior control of State power.

FIRST CLASS—CONSTANT RETURNS.

Industries of the first class are such as demand a proportional increase in capital and labor to secure a given increase in product. That is to say, if 2x capital and labor result in 2y product, the application of 3x capital and labor would gain 3y product. The increment of return is equal to the increment of capital. All those businesses in which success depends on attention to detail and where the personal element of the laborer is brought prominently into view fall under this class. For example, the retail business of merchants is subject to the rule here stated.

e. g. Retail business: The struggle for superior success in these businesses is a struggle to depress the cost of rendering services rather than to raise the prices of services rendered.

It is not necessary for public officials to inquire if sugar is sold as low as fair dealings demand, for this business is one that admits easily of multiplication, and consequently invites competition. The step from a clerkship in a grocery to the proprietorship of a new establishment is not a difficult one to take, and for this reason we are assured that the profit of an ordinary grocer will not greatly exceed the salary which he pays his head clerk. There can, therefore, be no motive for endeavoring to apply the rule of public financiering to businesses of this sort.

SECOND CLASS—DECREASING RETURNS.

Farming: The same conclusion applies to the second class of industries, where a given increment of product calls for a proportionally greater increment of capital and labor. Assuming the same relation to exist in an established business as before, if 2x capital is required for 2y product, an additional x of capital will not produce an additional y of product, but something less. That is to say, 3x capital may produce but 2½y product. Industries of this sort are said to be subject to the law of diminishing returns, and it calls for no abstruse argument to recognize that society is quite safe in submitting such lines of industry to the control of competition. The rate of product in the new industry is greater than that in the one that is further developed, and for this reason we may rely upon individual interest to maintain a large number of separate producers. The agricultural industry is usually cited as an illustration to which the principle of diminishing returns may be said to apply, and, if we leave out of view the element of accruing rent, the conclusion which we have suggested may be applied in its most extreme form to the business of farming. There is no call for Government farming.

THIRD CLASS—INCREASING RETURNS.

The peculiarity of those industries belonging to the third class, which we now come to consider, lies in the fact that they conform to the law of increasing rather than to the law of constant or decreasing returns. The increment of product from an expanding enterprise is greater than the increment of capital and labor required to secure its expansion. Adopting the algebraic formula, as before if 2x capital give 2y product, an economic application of 3x capital will give more than 3y product. * * * The important thought in this connection is that where the law of increasing returns works with any degree of intensity the principle of free competition is powerless to exercise a healthy regulating influence. This is true, because it is easier for an established business to extend its facilities for satisfactorily meeting a new demand than for a new industry to spring into competitive existence. If this analysis of industries be accepted as correct, there can be no question as to the line which marks the duties of the State. The control of the State over industries should be coextensive with the application of the law of increasing returns in industries.

There are many other lines of business which conform to the principle of increasing returns, and for that reason come under the rule of centralized control. Such businesses are by nature monopolies. We certainly deceive ourselves in believing that competition can secure for the public fair treatment in such cases or that laws compelling competition can ever be enforced. If it is for the interest of men to combine, no law can make them compete. For all industries, therefore, which conform to the principle of increasing returns, the only question at issue is whether society shall support an irresponsible extra-legal monopoly or a monopoly established by law and managed in the interest of the public. In this latter way may the benefits of organization in the form of monopoly be secured to the people, and in no other.

Thus where we have the law of increasing returns as a cause we have monopoly as a result. How shall that monopoly be rendered of the greatest service to society? Well, that, it is said, is a question of motive in financiering:

Private financiering: The relations here set forth will present themselves more clearly to our minds if we throw into comparison the rule of public and the rule of private financiering. A private business is managed to secure a profit, and, other things being equal, the higher the price secured for any service rendered, the higher will be the profit. The rule of private financiering therefore is to maintain the price of goods or services at the highest price which has no tendency to curtail profitable business. The price of goods in this case will equal the cost of production, plus the profit to the undertaker, and the only guaranty against exorbitant rates lies in the fact that purchasers are free to choose from whom they will buy.

Public financiering: The rule of public financiering, on the other hand, conforms to an altogether different principle. It is the purpose of government to render services at the lowest price consistent with efficient service. Price equals cost. This is true, because the State, being the manager of the business, has no motive in acquiring riches. The officers of the State receive their salaries which, roughly speaking, may be said to correspond to the profit secured by the managers of private enterprises. The guaranty that price will not be more than cost of production, including salaries of officers, lies in the publicity of accounts and in all that goes to make up efficient service. In theory, therefore, we should expect parallel results from a monopoly under control of the State and from a business privately organized directed by the principle of free competition.

The public-service motive: In institutions, as with individuals, motive is everything. The motive to serve one's self is the common motive, and to impose sufficient restraint upon its operation, when unsocial, is, stated in a broad way, the principal object of government. There is much illogical complaint in this respect against what are called "public utilities." Their owners, who have invested their money with the purpose of gain, are expected to behave differently from investors in general. Of course they do not, but why should we expect them to? Because they have a monopoly, it is argued. Well, this may impose an inferential duty, yet who will say that it can have a decisive influence upon the normal motive of the investor to gain all he can?

Where public needs and social considerations become the principal and dominating purpose, where imperative public service is the object, the world naturally has not yet found the restricted private motive adequate to the work. Let me illustrate the normal action of this motive under the rule of private financiering.

An English railway, some 60 years ago, had the question presented to it as to how to graduate its passenger rates to secure the best returns. Much as one adjusts his opera glass in the theater to obtain the clearest line of vision, these railway officers adjusted and readjusted their passenger rates. They tried rates all the way from 6 cents a mile to one-half a cent a mile, and found that as the rate was 3½ cents a mile or one-half cent a mile, the higher charge produced 6 per cent and the lower charge only 4 per cent dividends; and, acting on the private motive, or the rule of private finance, they rejected the rate which would have produced the greater public service and adopted that yielding the higher returns.

The rule of private financiering is obviously applicable to Classes I and II of the economists, while the rule of public financiering is equally applicable to Class III, to which the publicists and economists formally assign telegraphy, the telephones, expressage, and similar services. Against this view we have only the misapplication, by the superficial or interested, of the doctrine of laissez faire. Let us see what this doctrine is.

Prof. Cairnes says:

I must ask you, in the first place, to note what this doctrine of laissez faire, if it is to be taken as a scientific principle, really means. The implied assertion, as I understand it, is this: That, taking human beings as they are, in the actual state of moral and intellectual development they have reached; taking account of the physical conditions with which they are surrounded in the world; lastly, accepting the institution of private property as understood and maintained in most modern States, the promptings of self-interest will lead individuals in all that range of their conduct which has to do with their material well-being spontaneously to follow that course which is most for their own good and for the good of all. Such is the assertion with which we have now to deal, and you will see at once that it involves the two following assumptions: First, that the interest of human beings are fundamentally the same—that which is most for my interest is also most for the interest of other people—and, secondly, that individuals know their interests in the sense in which they are coincident with the interests of others, and that, in the absence of coercion, they will, in this sense, follow them.

Applied in its extreme or absolute form, Mill observes that "it excludes some of the most indispensable and unanimously recognized functions of government," and even Cairnes, far from claiming for it finality in application, cautions us thus:

Only let us remember that it is a practical rule and not a doctrine of science; a rule in the main sound, but, like most other sound practical rules, liable to numerous exceptions; above all, a rule which must never be allowed to stand in the way of a candid consideration of any promising proposal of social or industrial reform.

It is strongly pointed out by the sociologists that the misapplication of this maxim of laissez faire, and the consequent neglect of society to discharge its true functions with respect to monopolies, is charged with serious dangers.

The policy of restricting public powers within the narrowest possible limits tends to render government weak and inefficient, and a weak government placed in the midst of a society controlled by the commercial spirit will quickly become a corrupt government; this in its turn reacts upon commercial society by encouraging private corporations to adopt bold measures for gaining control of government machinery. Thus the doctrine of laissez faire overreaches itself; for the application of the rule which it lays down—

Major premise: All human interests are the same.

Minor premise: Each man knows his own interest, and if left to himself will follow it.

Conclusion: The best possible form of social relations will emerge from the unrestricted play of industrial freedom—

* * * will absolutely destroy that harmony between public and private duties essential to the best results in either domain of action. (Ibid.)

Mr. Chairman, I shall not, at this point, take the time of the House to point out the moral adduced in the last excerpt. I shall not compare the public morals of New York and Berlin in street railway history; nor of London and San Francisco in the matter of the telephone. Nor will it be necessary to point to the contrast presented by our untainted postal system, the peer of any postal organization in efficiency and honorable history.

Now, I think it plain that the doctrine of laissez faire has its true interpretation in the statement that society ought not to enter upon fields of activity where the forces of competition insure to consumers, who represent the social interest, the prevalence of competitive prices. It surely can not be applied to a monopoly, since the conditions for the play of individual freedom and struggle, predicated by the statement of the doctrine itself, are excluded in its very terms. But what is an industrial monopoly? The answer of the economist is: "An industrial monopoly may be defined as a business superior to the regulating control of competition." And what are its advantages and characteristics? Their answer is:

Provided a business admits of something like military organization; provided the details of its management have been well worked out; provided its extension to meet new demands may be accomplished by merely duplicating what already exists; and provided the social want which it supplies is widespread and constant, exclusiveness in management must lead to efficiency of management, if only men of adequate ability may be found to assume authority. Under such conditions a service may be rendered at less cost to the public than if the agents of the monopoly were broken up into competing groups. There are several reasons why this is true. The fact of an assured demand for services rendered admits of the closest calculations; the extent of the demand also allows of a minute application of the principle of division of labor; the absence of any rivalry between competing concerns precludes the necessity of expending more capital than is required for an economical performance of the service; and, what is perhaps of as much importance as any other consideration, there is no temptation to adopt speculative methods of management which lead to the covering of unnecessary losses of one period by the arbitrarily high profits of another. Thus the possibility of cheapness and efficiency seems to lie in the very nature of a monopoly. This is the beneficent principle of which mention was made, and the practical question is how to realize the benefits of this principle for society. (Prof. Adams, The State, etc.)

It is enough, sir, to add at this point that the conclusions of these authorities are much more than mere dicta. Every important country of the world—England wholly, as to the telephone only but recently—has long adopted these views. I insert later a list of them which finds the United States looking very solitary, with only Spain for respectable company. The authority of the above conclusions of science, supported by the almost unanimous examples of other countries, will be argument sufficient to most people for like postal assumption here. They will intuitively liken the telegraph and the telephone with our experience with the express companies and the parcel post, so long delayed by certain causes, and will feel that at last the age of constructive statesmanship has crossed the Atlantic and inspired a great party, suppressed for two generations, with its purposes to serve mankind. But, sir, I should be derelict to rest the argument on the authority of examples, however general and impressive, and so I must ask the patience of the House while I enter into a minute analysis of the facts which govern approach to businesslike conclusions on this subject.

ANALYSIS AND COMPARISON.

THE TELEGRAPH.

Let us briefly summarize the conclusions reached by the economists:

(a) That the store and farm are competitive, not monopolistic, in character, as shown by the circumstances that the prices are fluctuating. But the telegraph and telephone services are not truly competitive. Their prices do not tend to fluctuate. Thus they have the price characteristic of monopolies.

(b) There being no competition, the rule of private financiering obtains, if the monopoly be privately owned; the higher the price secured the higher will be the profit.

(c) Conducted with this motive—private—the utilization of the monopoly is restricted to rendering only that degree of social service consistent with maintaining such prices.

(d) Accordingly the private conduct of a monopoly is not productive of its highest utilization or greatest social service.

Social efficiency: These maxims may be illustrated in the most direct way. In the United States there was up to the eighties something of competition between rival telegraph companies, and at competing points there were 10, 15, and 20 cent rates. The inevitable law is that such interests will not compete when it is more profitable to combine. There is now a complete concentration of the Western Union and Postal Telegraph Cos. with respect to rates, and the 10, 15, and 20 cent rates have been raised to 25 cents. The result is that while street-car fares, electric-lighting charges, even the price of gas, and transportation rates have, generally, gone down with the increase of business, telegraph rates remain substantially the same as they were fixed by these companies in 1888.

In New Zealand the telegraph system is under the principle of public financiering and conducted by the post office. Since price levels there generally, as well as social and educational conditions, resemble those of the United States, it will be permissible to compare the service there with our own. As against the minimum rate under private financiering of 25 cents in the United States, the New Zealand minimum rate is 12 cents. This illustrates the normal functioning of the telegraph monopoly as publicly and privately financiered, for both rates are equally normal in relation to their facts of ownership. By which it is meant to say that if the private financier should discover that only the lowest rates would produce the maximum of profit, and the public financier that only the highest rates would insure the most extensive public service, we should immediately have the New Zealand rate in the United States and the American rate in New Zealand.

But is it equally true that the rule of private financiering prevents the highest social service or full potential use of this particular form of monopoly? In answer I will continue the comparison with New Zealand:

Country.	Rate	Number messages for 100 population.
New Zealand (1)	$0.12	896
United States (2)	0.25 to 1.00	115

Thus, under what appears to be similar price and wage levels and social and industrial conditions, we have a telegraph institution under the rule of public financiering yielding about eight times the social service attained by private financiering.

From this experience we adduce another conclusion. The New Zealand State compares with one of our own of like extent and population. Its experience indicates a potential demand of eight telegrams per capita per annum for the United States, seven-eighths of which fails to find a permissible rate, and is thus suppressed by the relatively prohibitive tariffs under private financiering. If this be the case, the defects are economically unpardonable; for in offending against the law of normal efficiency, by an almost complete failure to perform the function, the functionary's right to control becomes forfeit. A high rate, the highest rate, of profit, even at the cost of excessive prices, society may be willing to grant as a concession to the rights of the private financier; but a radical failure to consummate its function and afford effective accommodation for the normal requirements of society is fundamental delinquency.

INADEQUACY OF EXTENSION.

It has been suggested that substantially the entire capital and current expenditures of the rival telegraph company is wasted with reference to competitive territory. The antonym of this condition is the absence of any telegraphic service at points which are unattractive to private finance. There are 64,022 post offices and branches in the United States and but 8,849 (1912) offices maintained by the telegraph companies themselves, although they treat some 22,282 railway-signal stations as telegraph offices. Converting the railway telegraph into phone signaling is reducing this rather doubtful claim for proper geographical distribution of the telegraph service, where, with the railway business having necessary precedence, the citizen's message, even where service was given, came as a third and last attention. These telegraph offices are maintained by the railways at their own expense and for their own purposes, and would be quite as available for the postal administration as they are now to the telegraph companies. They can hardly be claimed as belonging to the service rendered by the telegraph companies proper. A comparison of the service rendered under postal administration elsewhere and private financiering here may be of interest.

[1] Commercial offices, maintained by the companies.

Two telegraph offices to three post offices, at least, elsewhere, but one to seven here.

Stated in another way, the commercial telegraph companies maintain less than one (0.8) office for 10,000 of population in the United States, while their rate averages 49 cents per message as against 16 cents in New Zealand, which maintains over 18 (18.51) telegraph offices to each 10,000 of its population. Why, sir, the nearest county seat to this Capitol is without a telegraph office. Such a statement can not be made of the postal system. When this is considered in connection with the fact that New Zealand gets a working efficiency of 3,980 telegrams per employee per annum out of its personnel—telegraph—and the American companies but 2,933, it is not difficult to see how far the private financier falls short of realizing that higher efficiency which economists declare feasible in properly financiered monopolies.

A TRAFFIC-KILLING TELEGRAPH RATE.

Mr. Chairman, the most serious exaggeration of the high cost of service per message in Western Union finance remains to be stated. It is the factor inseparable from the financiering of a private price-making monopoly. I refer to the necessarily low plant utilization practicable, measured in units of service attained, where the rates are made with a view to the maximum profit. Now, the effect of raising the price of any commodity or service is to correspondingly diminish the effective demand for it, and this principle is well exemplified for the telegraph service in an experience which I shall take the time to relate. The following statement is taken from page 26 of "Investigation of Western Union and Postal Telegraph-Cable Cos." by the Bureau of Labor:

> In this connection it is interesting to cite the case of the Chicago & Milwaukee Telegraph Co., which was organized in 1878. It began by charging a 10-cent rate for 10 words and 1 cent for each additional word between Chicago and Milwaukee. It does principally a board-of-trade business, having its office in the board of trade building in Chicago. In 1878 the Western Union cut the rate to 5 cents for 10 words, or one-half cent a word for all words between these points. The Chicago & Milwaukee Co. met the cut so far as quotations were concerned, but kept up its 10-cent rate on orders, and this rate continued for several years to board of trade members. Finally, in 1904, the Western Union raised the rate to 25 cents for all except members of the board of trade, to whom a 15-cent rate still obtains, and the smaller company raised its rate to 15 cents for 10 words and 1 cent for each additional word to all except board of trade members, to whom it gave a 10-cent rate. Later it made a 15-cent rate to all. It does not deliver messages except by telephone, and will not accept a message for delivery to other than board of trade members, unless the delivery can be made by telephone.
> The company reports handling an average of 354 messages a day, at an average charge of 17½ cents per message, on a rate of 15 cents for 10 words and 1 cent for each additional word. This Chicago and Milwaukee rate is perhaps the only survival of the low rates which were wiped out by the understanding between the Western Union and the Postal Telegraph Cos., referred to by Mr. A. B. Chandler, ex-president of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., in his testimony before the Industrial Commission, March 5, 1901 (printed in Vol. IX, p. 195), as follows:
> "Q. Have you any understanding or agreement with your competitors in regard to a division of business or in regard to the method of conducting business?
> "A. We have no agreement or understanding with the Western Union Co. with reference to any division of business. They have no interest in our company, its property, or its business, and we have no interest in theirs; but we have an understanding with them respecting rates and respecting certain methods of competition, the giving of rebates, and things of that kind, that are equivalent to paying for the obtaining of business. We aim to put an end to that form of wasteful competition.
> "Q. What has been the practice concerning rebates and other forms of cutting prior to this agreement?
> "A. Such methods had prevailed to a very large extent previous to 1888 to a very injurious extent to all concerned. At the time such understanding was had a large number of rates were reduced, long-distance rates particularly, and the very low rates—10, 15, and 20 cent rates—that had been established by the various smaller competing companies were done away with, it having been well ascertained that the more business done on that basis the worse for the doer of it."

The sequel of this episode is that the Bell system at length secured control of the Chicago & Milwaukee Telegraph Co. and substituted a 25-cent rate. I have a statement of the business done under the 15-cent rate and under the 25-cent rate:

1909. Messages at 15-cent rate	103,248
1912. Messages at 25-cent rate	57,689
1913. Messages at 25-cent rate, 6 months, January to June 30	22,018

That is, a two-thirds increase in the rate resulted in a reduction of the traffic of about one-half, and this is, of course, according to the principles laid down. It appears the company secured about 18 cents per message in 1908 and about 27½ in 1912; that the gross receipts were $18,563.92 for 1909 and $19,355.71 for 1912, and since the expenditures about equaled receipts in 1912, it is apparent that the change in rates makes the operating cost per message nearly double that of 1909.

The accounting report of this company giving the items of disbursements is referred to as a clear illustration of the high expensiveness of private as compared with postal administration. Certainly, 40 per cent of its expenses would be susceptible of elimination under postal auspices. The motive of the increase in the rate for those making it was, however, that they secured about as much revenue for half the messages as they did for the normal number of messages; and with the reduction of the service to the public by one-half they were able to dismiss two operators and two messengers, saving their salaries as profit. But the effect, none the less, was to cut the plant utilization by one-half and reduce the service to the public by an equal amount. By the same set of causes the operation cost per telegram was nearly doubled.

At this point I shall insert a table, giving the telegraph rates and the social use made of them here as compared with the postal telegraph rates, and like uses in other countries.

But it may be suggested that the long-distance telephone has taken the place here of the telegraph, and that if such telephone messages be added to the telegrams the disparity would disappear. This does not happen to be true, because the long-distance or interurban telephone rates being even more prohibitive than the telegraphic rates result in the same restriction of traffic. In the telephone census the long-distance message is confused with the local "toll" and local public-booth messages and the total for the country given as 340,772,803. If we regard half of these as representing local talks as estimated by a qualified authority, then the comparison, so far as the data permit comparison, is as follows:

It appears that we rank second in postal rates and first in utilization, while we rank eighteenth in the telegraph rate charged and thirteenth in resulting social service.

Having applied these economic principles as criteria to determine the social efficiency of our telegraph service, let us now apply them to determine their administrative efficiency.

ADEQUACY OF ORGANIZATION.

Mr. Chairman, I present now the elements laid down by the political economists as necessary in the working organization of a monopoly in order that its service be rendered at the lowest cost, and that society should realize the benefits of a monopoly in the class of enterprises for which that form of capital and labor is economically and socially adapted. The elements are stated to be:

(a) Unity and exclusiveness of organization.
(b) Details of management well worked out.
(c) Facility for extension by mere duplication of existing structure.
(d) A social demand for the service which is widespread and constant.
(e) Adequate ability in authority.
Results:
(f) Service at less cost than if broken into groups, because
(g) Assured demands for service admits of closest calculations.
(h) Extent of demand admits of most minute division of labor.
(i) Absence of rivalry reduces to a minimum the amount of capital and other expenditures necessary for the performance of the service.
(j) Speculative management is eliminated;
(k) And thus, with public financiering motives,
(l) The maximum of cheapness and efficiency is rendered possible.

Mr. Chairman, it is, of course, not a matter of criticism that our telegraph monopoly is lacking in a main essential—the public-service motive. As a privately financiered organization, such a motive is against nature and should not be asked.

It is only by the employment of these factors that the highest utilization of the monopolistic institution can be attained. As we review them let us notice which kind of financiering, the privatative or the public, is most adapted to virilizing the respective factors.

(a) Unity and exclusiveness of organization: That this is a primary essential is almost a truism, admitted on all sides. The Bell Co. frankly justifies its war of capture or destruction of its rivals on this ground, and but recently in its campaign of advertising against the procedure of the Department of Justice for the enforcement of the antitrust laws declared:

We believe that the highest commercial value—

In which they mean to include the element of public service—

can only be attained by one system under one common control, and that it can not be given by independent systems unless they are controlled by agreements in effect making them a single system—and that is what the Bell system is.

Mr. Chairman, my preceding remarks have been mostly descriptive of the results under the principle of public and private financiering. Only by general analysis have they suggested, on a priori grounds, the processes of fact which cause the disappointing results where private financiering has been allowed to take the place of public financiering in the conduct of the telegraph monopolies. At this point, sir, it becomes necessary to make a painstaking investigation of the minute facts and circumstances comprising the management and workings of these agencies. If the inefficiency of our telegraph networks, as conducted in the United States, is plain, while our postal agency and competitive industries show, at least, more than the average efficiency, it may be that the particular causes of such inefficiency can be identified and brought to light. Let us take up these agencies of communication and compare their methods of operation with those of the post.

EFFICIENCY OF TELEGRAPHIC ADMINISTRATION.

Recurring now to the elements of organization essential to the highest utilization of a monopoly, for social purposes, we can dispose of the first, "unity and exclusiveness," by the mere statement that there are some 25 telegraph companies doing commercial business, and that two of them duplicate their agencies in more than half of the country. The next element, "efficiency in details of management," will require more elaborate discussion.

Mr. Chairman, the public is familiar with the high state of simplicity attained in postal administration, especially in dealing with the mail piece and safeguarding the revenues. I have had experienced telegraphers outline the processes and acts of attention devoted to the telegram under private administration of these agencies. They are as follows:

HANDLING OF COMMERCIAL MESSAGES.

THE TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

1. Figures charges on telegrams.
2. Reads each message for purpose of properly deciphering it.
3. Marks on each message "time filed."
4a. Enters each telegram on sheet "receiving clerk's record."
5. Turns in cash to local cashier.
6. Sends telegram.
7b. Puts time sent, numbers, sending and receiving operators' signals on telegram.
8c. Checks off numbers on number sheet, and initials sheet.

RECEIVING OPERATOR.

9. Receives and transcribes telegram on proper blank.
10d. Checks off number on number sheet and initials opposite the number.

DELIVERY CLERK.

11e. Makes wet copy of telegram.
12f. Puts delivery number on telegram.
13g. Makes out delivery sheet for messenger.
14h. Enters telegram on "delivery clerk's record."
15. Incloses telegram in envelope and addresses envelope.
16i. Examines delivery sheet to see telegram is properly receipted for.
17j. Collects cash from messenger to cover "collect received" telegrams.
18k. Turns in cash to local cashier.

MESSENGER BOY.

19. Delivers telegram to proper addressee.
20l. Secures receipt for telegram on delivery sheet.
21. Collects cash on "collect" telegrams.
22m. Returns delivery sheet and cash to delivery clerk.

RECEIVING OPERATOR (RELAY POINT).

23. Receives and transcribes telegram on proper blank.
24n. Checks off number on number sheet and initials sheet.

SENDING OPERATOR (RELAY POINT).

25. Sends telegram.
26o. Times telegram, etc.
27p. Checks off number sheet.

Here, then, are 27 processes, for 16 of which (the lettered ones) an argument of elimination might well be made with the introduction of the stamp and other simplified postal methods.

But whatever may be thought of the susceptibility to elimination of half of the above items, it is believed that the following, some 47 in number, all accounting processes, would give way under public management to the prepaid or postage-due stamp. We find it safe to intrust three hundred millions of postal revenue to such stamps now.

OPERATIONS IN THE ACCOUNTING DEPARTMENT.

CASHIER (LOCAL).

1. Checks up and balances "receiving clerk's record" of messages.
2. Checks up and balances "delivery clerk's record" of messages.
3. Checks up and balances money-order clerk's sent-and-received record.
4. Checks up "charge accounts," weekly or monthly bills of customers for messages.
5. Turns over above four accounts to bookkeeper.
6. Checks up receiving clerk's record, branch offices.
7. Checks up delivery clerk's record, branch offices.

BOOKKEEPER (LOCAL).

8. Records cash received, daily receiving clerk's record.
9. Records cash received, daily delivery clerk's record.
10. Records cash received, "sent" money orders record.
11. Records cash received, "received" money orders record.
12. Records cash received, receiving clerk's record, branch offices.
13. Records cash received, delivery clerk's record, branch offices.
14. Records all charge accounts.
15. Records payment of charge accounts.
16. Makes out weekly balance sheet.

CHARGE-ACCOUNT CLERK.

17. Makes out charge accounts (weekly and monthly).
18. Balance with bookkeeper.
19. Sends out bills of charge accounts.

AUDITOR'S OFFICE (LOCAL).

20. Balances with cashier "receiving clerk's" record.
21. Balances with cashier "delivery clerk's" record.
22. Balances with cashier receiving clerk's record, branch offices.
23. Balances with cashier delivery clerk's record, branch offices.
24. Checks up number sheets of main and branch offices.
25. Keeps book record of branch office receipts.
26. Inspects "sent messages" to see that they all bear number, time, and operator's signature.
27. Makes daily record of messages on forms supplied for "Sent paid," "Sent collect," "Received paid," "Received collect," for public, press, and Government accounts.
28. Statement of Government messages sent paid, for Government, for general auditor.
29. Statement of Government messages sent collect, for Government, for general auditor.
30. Statement of Government messages received paid, for Government, for general auditor.
31. Statement of Government messages received collect, for Government, for general auditor.
32. Statement of messages upon which there are other line tolls, for general auditor.
33. Makes daily check sheets for each city (amount of tolls).
34. Makes statement of "deadhead" messages.
35. Makes monthly statement of uncollected messages.
36. Sorts all messages as to cities.
37. Sorts all messages as "sent paid."
38. Sorts all messages as "received paid."
39. Sorts all messages as "sent collect."
40. Sorts all messages as "received collect."
41. Figures amount of tolls on each message.
42. Files all messages by dates.
43. Answers all check-error sheets.
44. Makes daily statement of "sent" press report (number of words and city).
45. Counts number of words in "sent" press matter.
46. Makes daily statement of "received collect" press matter.
47. Counts number of words in "received collect" press matter.

If it is objected that all these are very little things, let it be remembered that so, too, is the telegram; and that if it is to be loaded down with an accounting burden only to be compared with the accounting applied to a carload lot of freight in railway transportation, as the express companies have done with their packages, the 25-cent minimum of the railway and of the express company and the like minimum of the telegraph company becomes logical enough, even if economically indefensible for a mere electrical letter.

It is exactly accurate to say that merely affixing the stamp to the letter replaces these 47 accounting processes with the individual telegram under postal practice. That is, the postal system realizes the first great canon of a publicly financiered monopoly. Its "details of management have been well worked out."

It is not meant to criticize the fiscal management of the telegraph companies here described. There are many reasons why the conservative private financier may find it essential to employ all the processes set forth, although under postal financiering the postage-paid or postage-due stamp would safely suffice. The same phenomenon of relative rather than actual waste or inefficiency appears in the handling of the parcel by the express company when compared with the Postal Department.

LIST OF EXPRESS PROCESSES.

THE EXPRESS COMPANY.

1. Ascertains the rate to be paid. (The quotation of the parcel-post rates is nearly wholly from memory; that is, automatic.)
2. Makes out waybill.
3. Copies waybill into record of shipments "forwarded."
4. Copies same into record of shipments "received."
5. Makes statement of "shipments sent" to auditor.
6. Makes same of shipments "received."
7. Auditor checks waybills against record of "sending" agent.
8. Auditor checks same against record of "receiving" agent.
9. In case of "through" waybills previous items repeated.
10. Auditor makes division of percentages going to express company and the railway or railways.
11. In case of "through" waybills auditor makes like division of percentages between express companies and railways.

Affixing the postage stamp replaces all these processes in the post office.

If the Postal System were to copy express practice—that is, if it had to keep in view such a set of privatative relations to the shipment—the first pound parcel rate would have at least to be doubled to pay the expense. It is likely true that the telegraph companies would find it as impossible to eliminate these accounting processes as do the express companies. At the same time, the postal method finds the stamp a sufficient accountant and conservator of its revenues.

Traffic density and efficiency.

Country.	Telegrams per employee.		Telegrams per office maintained.
	Per annum.	Per day.	Per annum.	Per day.
New Zealand (1)	3,980	10.9	4,573	12.5
United States (6)	2,933	(2) 8.0	15,114	41.4

The New Zealand postal telegraph employee gives a daily and yearly product exceeding the private employee of the United States by over 36 per cent, and this in the face of the circumstance that the traffic supply in the American office exceeded the New Zealand by 231 per cent. If the New Zealand postal employee had presented him a daily supply of telegrams as great as the American, his product might have been twice or three times as great.

The vital test, as well as the instinct, of a truly private or competitive business is its ability to cheapen the productive cost of its unit of production. An increase of supply, or gross amount of production, is one of the factors which enable it to cheapen such cost. New Zealand wage levels are as high as our own, and its postal employees are said to enjoy an eight-hour day. Its telegrams cost it for all the expenses of operation just 24 (24.32) cents, while the American telegram cost 50 (49.76) cents, without including interest or taxes in either case. (Cablegrams, included with telegrams in operative expenses. See note 2.) Although the New Zealand postal employee in the telegraphic service got an average wage of $727.11 against $662.15 here, and had to maintain 4 (3.76) miles of wire per 100 persons served, as against 2 (1.97) miles here, and 1 (1.15) miles of pole line, as against one-quarter (0.26) of a mile here, it handles the telegram under high-plant utilization at an expense just half that of the private motive in the United States.

With three times the traffic density per office the telegraph companies of the United States still do not take first place in product per employee. Here attention is called to the gross amount of idle plant implied in the small number of telegrams per employee per average day—not more than 8 messages per day. This compares with 193, the average mail pieces per day for the average postal employee, with its collection, 620 miles of railway transportation, distributions, and deliveries over the city and rural routes.

I have thus far treated the question of efficiency as related to the amount of work or product which privately financiered and public financiered monopolies secured from their employees. But I put it to the serious judgment of the House whether the question of efficiency ought to be decided on such narrow grounds. Ought not such a question include a comparison of the rates charged to the public, and consequent degree of social service?

WASTES OF DUPLICATION.

Finally we have the competition of the Western Union Telegraph and the Mackay or Postal Co. The former has 220,938 miles of pole line and the latter 66,154 miles. The Postal Telegraph Co.'s lines are largely leased telephone wires. The 1912 census gives the total telephone pole lines as 247,528 miles, and the miles of wires 1,814,196. (Note 2.) The Postal Telegraph Co. has its complementary offices maintained by itself or numerous constituent companies. Nearly all of these are stationed at points where the Western Union maintains like offices. It is almost accurate to say that if one of them were to instantly withdraw from all these points the remaining company could handle the entire business without substantial increase of men or material. At such points there is a profit for both companies, although at 50,000 points where they have no offices the Postal Department maintains its offices without profit, using the profits from the larger ones to recoup the loss. Here is a fundamental defect which private financiering can not overcome. It will exploit to the point of wasted plant and personnel at the points of profit, but naturally refuses to apply its excess revenues from such points to maintain services at nonremunerative points.

Need it be suggested that the Postal Department at all these 50,000 points has its agencies established, and that where the wires are in the neighborhood to be connected with its existing offices, no additional expense would be incurred to furnish these services to that large portion of the public now denied them? Thus the plethora of service in the cities would be removed to the towns and country to correct the entire absence of service there. The Morse operator could be employed where the traffic justified. At the fourth-class, or even third-class, office, where it did not, the automatic receiver or mechanical sender or the phone might be employed to forward the message to or from a regular office. All this with only such additional expense as the traffic at such points would make necessary in extra compensation to the postmaster. But I need not detail the complete adaptability of the Postal System to readily absorb this secondary form of communication in nearly all instances without any of the costs which now attend telegraphy, except for maintenance and the wages of its operators, linemen, messengers, and necessary technical engineers.

Mr. Chairman, it is evident that our private exploitation of the telegraph agencies of communication fail to gratify the laws of either administrative or social efficiency. Their rates are the highest, their services the lowest, and their product per unit of economic energy employed among the lowest in the world. And all these failures are according to the laws laid down by the political economists of our time.

We turn now to the postal employee. Let us see what it is he does. Obviously, in the main, it is to handle the mail piece. How well does he perform this work? Here is the record for 27 years:

Year.	Number of employees.	Estimated number of pieces mailed, including foreign matter.	Number of mail pieces per employee per annum.	Cost per average mail piece, in cents.	Cost per average mail piece, in cents, excluding assignable cost of Rural Delivery Service.

Mr. Chairman, during the years of that record not only have the units of service more than doubled but city and rural delivery have been added, virtually doubling the quality of the service. And not only has the quality nearly doubled, the cost of the service, as we see, has been reduced for each piece. Sir, I invite any privately financiered public-service agency to compare its record as against this. Can any telegraph or telephone company enter the lists on this showing of advancing efficiency and progress?

At this point it may be interesting to compare our postal accomplishments with that of other nations.

Number of postal-service units per postal employee.[1]

[1] Data 1910.

Mr. Chairman, from this table it appears that Belgium is first and the United States second in postal efficiency among all the nations of the world. And if Belgium were not composed virtually of one large city with suburban surroundings I think we should really rank first.

The cost per message should decrease with the increase of the traffic, as shown with the mail piece, and another element of economy thus be added. The intent has been to show the failure to realize operative economy by merely confederating otherwise autonomous groups which, in the cases of the telegraph and telephone systems and their rate-making agreements, fail to produce the advantages or operative economy of a pure monopoly, but instead only an effective power to fix the rates most desirable to the owners.

THE TELEPHONE.

ANALYTICAL AND COMPARATIVE.

Mr. Chairman, so far I have placed under survey the telegraph agencies in relation to the postal systems of the principal countries of the world. My next duty is to apply the same standards of economic science to the telephone. In doing this I shall think it unnecessary to repeat what has already been stated of the telegraph where the matter is obviously equally applicable, nor shall I repeat the opinions of the economists whose criteria I mean to apply to telephone administration.

EFFICIENCY OF TELEPHONE MONOPOLY.

The canons of efficiency are the same for the telephone and telegraph:

(a) The social test: What is the degree of service rendered to the public?

(b) The economic: What does it cost the public?

(c) The publicist: What are the social influences?

How do these compare under private and postal financiering?

The telephone service subdivides itself into, first, the local and, second, the toll and long distance, and the statistics for each of these is twofold in character; that is to say, there are the varying rates fixed in the contracts corresponding, differing in the different cities and towns of the country, by which the patron secures a limited or an unlimited local service, or a measured, or a one or more party line service, or by which for toll or long-distance conversations the rate is graduated into day and night distinctions. Then there is the rate which is constituted from the sum of all these; that is to say, the total number of conversations, local, toll, and long distance, for a year is taken, and for each class, respectively, is divided into the receipts from that class, thus giving the average local, toll, and long-distance rates collected. This rate is called the statistical rate or average charge; the former, the tariffs paid by the patron, is called the tariff rate. I shall first present the local rates for the different countries statistically and compare them with the letter rates prevailing in each country:

Subscribers' local telephone rates.

Rank.	Country (1).	Average local phone rate.
		Mills.
1	Sakhalin, postal	4.4
2	Norway, private	4.5
3	United States, mutuals [1]	4.7
4	Japan, postal	4.8
5	Netherlands, municipal [2]	5.0
6	Netherlands, private [2]	5.0

Rank.	Country (1).	Average local phone rate.
		Mills.
7	Norway, postal	6.2
8	Manchuria, postal	6.2
9	Russia, postal	6.6
10	Bulgaria, postal	6.9
11	Formosa, postal	7.1
12	Sweden, postal	7.4
13	United States, independents	8.8
14	Chosen, postal	8.9
15	Tunis, State	9.5
16	Austria, postal	10.1
17	Denmark, private	10.5
18	Hungary, postal	10.5
19	Servia, postal	10.6
20	Queensland, postal	12.7
21	Tasmania, postal	13.1
22	West Australia, postal	13.3
23	Victoria, postal	13.9
24	Bosnia, postal	14.4
25	Germany, postal	14.6
26	Belgium, postal	16.6
27	Switzerland, postal	17.0
28	New South Wales, postal	17.3
29	United States, Bell (4)	18.6
30	France, postal	19.9
31	Middle Australia, postal	20.2

A computation of all the local calls between subscribers for all the telephone institutions reporting the data, including the American independents, shows that, including such calls of the Bell system, according to its report in 1912, there were altogether 19,572,244,474 such messages.

The Bell system secured $1.86 per 100 calls; the average for the others was but 93 cents per 100 calls. (5.)

Thus the Bell system places us twenty-ninth in line among telephone institutions, although we have the lowest letter rates in the world with the single exception of Japan, which charges 1½ cents per letter.

It will not do to say that our letter rate is too low or does not pay. It yields, in fact, a profit of about one-third. The local and other telephone rates given for the United States are for 1912, those of the Bell system embracing about two-thirds of the entire traffic. Our mutuals give a much lower rate, according to the statistics of 1907. The Bell system secures about twice the rate for its service collected by the independents, presumably giving a local service as good as the Bell's.

Let us review this 1907 American experience:

Average rate and operating expense per message.

	Rate.	Equals rate per year.	Operating expense.
Mutuals	$0.0047	$5.35	$0.0039
Independents	.0114	18.50	.0062
Bell system	.0211	42.35	.0148

The above table includes local, toll, and long distance for the independents and the Bell, whose statistics, taken from the census and the Bell report for 1907, were as follows:

	Receipts.	Expenses.	Number of messages.
Bell	$128,556,506	$87,908,000	5,977,000,000
Independents	55,227,531	29,782,964	4,829,547,057

The Bell data for 1907 are taken from its own report, while the independents' are taken from the census by deducting the Bell figures. The item of Bell receipts represents an estimate of $7,803,306 for its long-distance receipts, being double the amount of the item "Net $3,901,653 from telephone traffic." The item for maintenance and depreciation, $34,665,700, in the Bell account largely represents an element of undistributed profits which have been turned into new construction or purchase of other companies, the whole of this element for a series of years representing, according to the report of 1912, the sum of $165,000,000. This item probably largely accounts for the alleged much higher operating expense per phone of the Bell system.

It is urged by Mr. Vail, in his report for the Bell system in 1913, that:

We are opposed to Government ownership because we know that no Government-owned telephone system in the world is giving as cheap and efficient service as the American public is getting from all its telephone companies. We do not believe that our Government would be any exception to the rule.

And (12) the following table is cited in support of the declaration:

Average exchange revenue per telephone, by countries.

Austria, 1912	$24.96
Belgium, 1911	39.05
France, 1912	28.61
German Empire, 1911	22.69
Great Britain, 1912 (not including municipal systems)	32.60
Hungary, 1912	30.81
Switzerland, 1912	18.43
New Zealand, 1912	24.44
Australia, 1912	28.53
Average for foreign countries	26.82
Bell system, 1912	30.93

This method merely shifts one from the call or message to the phone as the unit of price measurement. But even so, the assertion is not sustained by the facts. The following tables are taken from official sources (1) and give the average revenue per phone from (a) local calls between subscribers and (b) the average revenue per phone from toll and long-distance messages.

Chosen, State	3,911	235	34.24	111
Belgium, State	3,129	190	47.15	152

Thus the Bell system ranks the highest but 4 among 29 in the gross amount collected per phone for the local service, and the highest but 2 judged by price and product, France and middle Australia alone exceeding it.

A like table for the toll and long-distance services is now submitted:

Country	Toll and interurban calls per phone.	Per cent of Bell messages per phone.	Receipts per phone.	Per cent of Bell revenue per phone.

Thus, for what it does, the Bell phone secures the highest payment; on the subscribers' local call service greater than all other 29 systems, except France and middle Australia, two belated telephone countries; on the toll and long distance greater than all 29 except Servia. That is—

Rank of Bell system, local service, in 29, twenty-seventh.

Rank in toll and long-distance service, in 29, twenty-eighth.

The fact that the independents rank at a point representing the average of other countries precludes the defense of American price levels. The Bell system, because of its great size, not to speak of its initial advantages as the patentee, and excellent management in this respect, is said to cost less per phone than either the independents or foreign systems. (12.)

An effort is made to explain the disparity by the higher American wages paid; but the rates of the independents are but half those of the Bell system, and they work under American conditions. But there is a prodigious difference between the number of employees per phone and pole line unit between the two. It is possible that much of the current expense and personnel, as in the case of many railroads in the past, is being devoted to development and construction by the Bell system, which, if true, might account for the difference.

THE TARIFFS.

The statistical charges give but a very deficient conception of the situation as to actual telephone tariffs. While there are points at which a phone may be rented on the basis of yearly tariffs of $24 for business and $18 for residence service; as a matter of fact, with the Bell system at least, the rule of 5 cents a call comes more nearly expressing the rate available to the city public. This is seen in the following examples allocated according to the density of the different centers of population.

Comparisons based on the flat or unlimited-service rate do not adequately present the field of traffic. While, except in small towns and for the residence service, the flat-rate business works out the lowest average charge per call, it does not reflect the degree to which a popular use of the service may be had. To measure these possibilities we must go to the limited or measured-service rates, under which the user is asked to pay in accordance to the number of calls. This comparison can not be made as simple as for the flat-rate tariffs without circumscribing, which I shall do by taking selected numbers of rates as, for example, the cost per call of the first 2,000, 5,000, and 10,000 calls for one-party business lines:

Postal telephone rates, like mail rates, are uniform for similar services. The following table of the same rival gives the rates of the Bell system for some 60 cities, graded from the highest to the lowest populations. The letter (c) indicates competition.

The depressing influence of competition on the rates is obvious:

NOTE (a): Limited to 5,700 calls; Manhattan district only. NOTE (b): Limited to 5,400 calls.

Twenty-four cities, averaging 342,486 in population, pay an average rate of $53 under competition, while the remaining 36 cities, averaging 188,620 in population, without competition, pay $81. Even where competition is absent there does not appear to be any rational order of rates. Stockton, Cal., with 23,253 population, pays the same rate ($60) as Des Moines, Iowa, with 86,368, and pays twice as much as Johnstown, Pa., with 55,482 population, and only $24 less than Chicago, Ill., under competition.

Mr. Speaker, I have now to present, comparatively, the toll rate for the different countries. Except in the United States and where otherwise stated, the service is postally conducted. (7), (11).

NOTE.—The letters preceding the name of each country are used to identify the countries to which the rates given for 300, 500, and 700 miles belong.

Thus the Bell system gives the United States the fifteenth and last place in the scale of efficiency with respect to long-distance charges. This is a most serious circumstance for us economically and socially, in view of the American scale of distances, as may be seen in our average freight haul, which is ten times that of Great Britain, and from four to five times as long as in the other countries. This circumstance but lightly reflects our need for utilizable rates over the telephone for the scale of distances which separate the centers of communication in the United States. The Bell Telephone has an even rate of 6 mills a mile for a three-minute conversation; and a thousand miles therefore commands a Bell charge of $6 per talk. This happens to be about the same rate (7.53 mills) the railways secure for hauling a ton of freight a mile. But the railways do not make their charge arithmetically progressive. If they were to do so, their rate on the longer distances would be so high as to sweep such traffic from the rails. What they do in fact, although not in theory, is to double the charge as the distance quadruples. Thus the charge for 25 miles might be 10 cents per 100 pounds, first class; the rate for 100 miles would be 20 cents; for 400 miles, 40 cents; for 900 miles, 60 cents; the rate increasing not arithmetically but according to the square root of the number of miles. Thus if the charge for a phone call were placed at 10 cents for 25 miles, on the square-root formula it would increase to 20 cents for 100 miles, 40 cents for 400 miles, 50 cents for 625 miles. In fact, such a rate would slightly exceed the long-distance rates on the Continent.

It will be urged, of course, that prices are higher here; but they are not higher here, they are higher in Europe on the copper and metal poles, which mainly enter into the capital cost of a long-distance line; higher by the price of the transportation of such material from this country to the Continent. It may cost more to conduct such a line here in the expense of personnel, but the difference could hardly be more than 10 per cent of the continental rate. It is true, however, that a special charge is made abroad for an urgency, or preferential, use of the line, but its payment secures one the preference, while with the Bell system the charge is all the same and one has to wait his turn despite the rate.

The effect of these abnormal rates upon the utilization of the long-distance service may readily be seen. The number of interurban conversations per phone in the different countries is as follows:

[1] But see note 14.

Mr. Chairman, it is apparent, of course, that our telephone rates fail to satisfy the law of social efficiency.

The truth is that no attempt is made to justify these rates on the grounds of social efficiency. This is frankly declared by the managers of the Western Union and Bell telephone system. I quote from the report of the Bell system for 1911:

> Instantaneous and immediate transmission of communications is as yet a convenience or luxury, although under modern methods of business and commerce it is an economical alternative to the cheaper mail service in business operations. The use of the telegraph may be a popular convenience, but it is not a necessity and is still confined to the comparatively few, and for that reason should be at the cost of the few that find benefit and profit in that use.

This is bold language. We are virtually told that of the three great agencies of communication only one, the letter post, may be used by all the people, and that the other two, the phone and the telegraph, are conveniencies or luxuries, not popular necessities, and for that reason should be at the cost of the few; that is, of the business office and the rich, to which class largely the present rates confine the service. But this is not a justification. It is a confession. These tariffs are endured because the service is known only to those in easy circumstances, who overlook the rates in the glamour of the marvelous character of the process of communication.

I should utter a caution against the spirit of prejudice likely to be elicited by the great disparity shown in the rates under postal and private financiering. The gentlemen who are exploiting this service for profit as their private property have, doubtless, decided correctly that the American rates yield the very maximum of profit. This is what people do in the conduct of a hotel, I suggest. True, this is what we all should do if we could; it is the normal rule of private financiering. But competition plays its part where monopoly is inadmissible and protects us from ourselves. So we do not blame the individual. He is obeying the laws of his nature. But the Government, without whose incidental approval or protection such a monopoly could not exist—is it to be held blameless for abandoning its functions and submitting its citizens to exactions which are the scandal of public-service rates the world over, and with which only our former express rates can justly be compared?

ADMINISTRATIVE EFFICIENCY.

Let us look now into the question of the operative efficiency of the privately financiered telephone as compared with its public and postal management in other countries:

Telephone and postal operative efficiency.[1]

Country.	Phone calls per employee per annum.	Rank.	Country.	Postal units per employee per annum.[2]	Rank.

[1] 1912, see note 1. [2] Data of 1910, see note 3. [3] Includes local service and personnel.

Thus judged in terms of the amount of product per employee, or the degree of institutional functioning per employee, the Bell system ranks but ninth among the 12 telephone institutions for which the data permit comparison, while 5 public and 3 private institutions excel it, according to the same standards.

In the column for phone efficiency the long-distance or interurban call is included and rated as equal to four local calls in its demands upon the personnel. The column for postal efficiency is inserted to show the performance of the postal personnel. For this purpose the postal-service unit is treated as the average mail piece and the telegram as equal in service to 10 mail pieces, while the local call is rated as equal to one-half mail piece, or unit, and the interurban as equal to 2 mail pieces. All kinds of employees of the telephone and post are included in the statement. While these service valuations are only assumptions, it is believed that they are approximately accurate, and certainly in no case unfair to the phone service, as may be seen in the cases of Norway, Russia, and the independent companies of the United States, where the phone performances per employee reach as high as 118,500, 113,315, and 111,014, respectively. It appears that the American postal system ranks second among 12 countries on the mail piece, while the Bell Co. on the phone ranks but ninth, among 12 telephone institutions, in institutional efficiency, or product per employee.

Now, what is the cause of this disparity? An inferior American personnel? No; the record of the American postal personnel answers that charge. What, then, is it? My explanation is that it is the deterrent influence of high rates on the amount of the traffic and consequent plant utilization. Obviously the amount of traffic will depend on the rate. If it should cost me but a cent a call, I will use the phone freely; if it cost me a nickel, I should probably restrict my calls. So, too, not only may the message rate be so high as to discourage the degree of use of the phone (see discussion of regulation for exemplification of this fact), but the rate for phone subscription may keep the phone out entirely. In short, to a vast majority of the people the degree of utilization depends on the cost, and these as subscribers will spend less at the higher rate than they will at the lower. The low performance, therefore, represents the unutilized time of the employees and wires caused by rates, which to that extent are prohibitive of potential utilization; the plant is subjected to low service performance, while the same cause operates to deny society its use. This statement is susceptible of illustration in the experience of American telephone administration. As we have seen, the Bell average charge in 1912 was 1.86 cents per call, while that of the independents was 0.88 cent, or about half.

We reach the same conclusion for the telephone that we had reached for the telegraph. Private financiering fails to secure either the maximum of social service or the maximum of plant utilization. Its rule condemns the agency to a half marketing of its potential yield. Society under its rule must sacrifice half or more of the utility of this great agency of public communication. Suppose the farmer should organize into a monopoly, restraining the marketing of half his wheat production, half the normal yield, on the theory that the half crop would produce the same revenue as the whole. Will the defender of half service and double pay reply that the cases are different; that the "instantaneous and immediate transmission of communications is as yet a convenience or luxury, confined to the comparatively few, and for that reason should be at the cost of the few that find benefit or profit in that use"? It remains to be seen whether this ambitious rival of the postal function, like the express companies, can defy the public for 40 years.

ADEQUACY OF ORGANIZATION.

Mr. Chairman, in treating of the telegraph I presented the elements laid down by the political economists as necessary in the working organization of a monopoly, in order that its service be rendered at the lowest cost, and that society should realize the possible benefits of a monopoly in the class of enterprises for which that form of capital and labor is economically and socially adapted. But it may not be amiss to restate them here for application to our telephone agencies. The elements are stated to be:

(a) Unity and exclusiveness of organization.

(b) Details of management well worked out.

(c) Facility for extension by mere duplication of existing structure.

(d) A social demand for the service which is widespread and constant.

(e) Adequate ability in authority.

RESULTS.

(f) Service at less cost than if broken into groups, because—

(g) Assured demands for service admit of closest calculations.

(h) Extent of demand admits of most minute division of labor.

(i) Absence of rivalry reduces to a minimum the amount of capital and other expenditures necessary for the performance of the service.

(j) Speculative management is eliminated.

(k) And thus with a public-service motive,

(l) The maximum of cheapness and efficiency is rendered possible.

Mr. Chairman, it is, of course, not a matter of criticism that the telephone monopoly, like the telegraph, is lacking in a main essential—the public-service motive. In a privately financiered organization such a motive is against nature and should not be asked. With the other elements, while it may be painstaking, it may be instructive to deal.

UNITY OF ORGANIZATION.

Exclusiveness of organization is, of course, denied to the Bell Co. where a rival service has found location. But to what extent does it possess unity of organization even within itself? There is likely to be a great deal of misapprehension on this point, and unity of administration may be erroneously inferred to exist merely from the fact of the concentrative power to control the making of rates. Thus the Mackay and the Bell companies have agreed on rates, just as the fire insurance companies have done. But in neither of these instances is it claimed that unity of management or organization has been attained. The perfection of unity and of exclusiveness—except as to the express service—is, of course, found in the postal organization. In which class will the Bell system be assigned? I think it clear that it can be assigned in neither; that it is not an organization in the organic sense, but an amalgamation for which the most appropriate word of description is that used by its officers, namely, the "associated companies." But an "amalgamation" or a system does not imply the reduction of methods to the ultimum of simplicity, or the number of processes to the feasible minimum. If the structure of each company amalgamated, with its distinct officialdom and accounting institutions, is preserved, as would appear to be necessary with a distinct legal proprietorship for each, then, while the methods of a holding company with a majority of stock may give the power over rates and appointment of officials for the constituent company, this mode may be far from reducing to a minimum either the personnel or the interproprietary transactions.

It is this method of controlling rather than of assimilating the different exchanges which characterizes the Bell system; in fact, the expression employed is "the associated companies." Thus, speaking of them, Mr. Vail says: "The organization as constituted will be flexible enough to enable any rearrangement to be made of the whole or any part, in any way which may be found necessary or advantageous from reasons of policy or from business or legal reasons without affecting business." The aim has evidently been to so articulate the different exchanges that they can be used for a common purpose and yet so preserve the autonomous elements in each to meet any business or legal situation that may arise—the enforcement of the antitrust laws, for example. Such conditions preclude simplicity and singleness of process, the concomitants of economy and efficiency attained by the institution possessing unity and exclusiveness of organization. That the Bell system is not organized to realize the maximum economies of a single organization is seen in the comparison of its operating costs per message as compared with the independents on a preceding page. Equating the employees into work done, we have:

	One employee serves—
	Phones.	Miles of pole line.	Miles of wire.
Bell system	36	2.5	107
Independents	54	7.7	94

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS.

Sir, it appears that, despite our high price and wage levels in the United States, we take first place as to postal rates; but our standing on the electrical communication is as follows:

RANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

In telegraph rates, among 18 countries, eighteenth.

Bell system local phone rates, among 31 telephone systems, twenty-ninth.

In long-distance rates, among 15 countries, fifteenth.

Mr. Chairman, let me explain the significance of these conditions. Recurring to the analysis of industries placing meras Class II, because of its law of diminishing returns; and such industries as the post, the express service, and the telegraph and telephones in Class III, under the law of increasing returns: The first two classes belong to the realm of competition, and therefore to private financiering, while the third class—the public-service monopolies—belong to the domain of public financiering. Now, what do we find? That in the United States Classes I and II—the store and farm, privately financed, according to their natures, and acting under circumstances of struggle and competition—are unquestionably among the most economically conducted of their kind among nations. That our Postal Service, publicly financed, in spite of our high price levels, is giving rates the lowest prevalent in the world, and possesses the very highest working efficiency; while the two examples of the third class—the telegraph and telephone monopolies, like the express companies, subjected unnaturally to the rule of private financiering—rank among the very lowest in working efficiency and among the highest in the rates exacted from the public.

I think it apparent from all these comparative experiences that the doctrine of laissez faire is clearly inapplicable to the telegraph and the telephone; i. e., that these public agencies of communication do not belong legitimately to the field of the rule of private financiering. I quote Prof. Adams again:

> In taking the position here assumed it need not be implied that one is arguing either for or against State socialism, but merely that the doctrine of laissez faire does not permit society to realize in any adequate degree the benefits of organization in the form of monopoly. This is true for several reasons, but especially because there are many industries which from their nature are monopolies and can not therefore be safely consigned to the guidance of the rule of private financiering. It is certainly absurd to say that a business superior to the regulating influence of competition, conducted according to the principle that the highest possible price should be demanded for services rendered, can be managed in a spirit of fairness to the public. Such a business ought to be made to conform to the rule of public financiering, but the common prejudice aroused by the teachings and superficial application of laissez faire renders this difficult of accomplishment. "In some countries," says Mr. Mill, "the desire of the people is not for being tyrannized over, but in others it is for an equal chance to everybody to tyrannize." So long as public opinion refuses to enter upon a candid analysis of the nature of industries for the purpose of discovering which of them may be safely consigned to the guidance of competition, large numbers of private monopolies will be maintained. If men persist in thinking themselves free because the law grants them an equal chance with their fellow men to became monopolies, the great majority will pass their lives in that state which even conservative writers call commercial dependence. Bastiat is right when he speaks of the interest of the consumer as identical with the "social interest," in so far as this question of monopolies is concerned, for it is only when we regard the problem from the point of view attained by considering the collective interest of society that we can secure a just appreciation of the relation of government to business activity.

To what conclusion does all this lead? Plainly, I suggest, to the conclusion that we are violating the laws of sound public economics. Plainly, I suggest again, that we have violated the laws of economic science in allowing to the functionaries of private finance those things which were not theirs. There is a law of private finance; there is a law of public finance. Each has its subjects upon which, properly confined, each will normally operate for the maximum of human service. We are ignoring one of these laws by yielding to the private financier a postal duty. Let him rule in his own field restrained by the laws of competitive industry, he will prove a social servitor and a blessing. But continue him in the field of public finance where his instincts of profit making can only be misapplied, and those unwelcome results follow which would be expected to follow if public finance were applied to store and farm, namely, high prices and the lowest social and operative efficiency.

COMPETITION.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to this method as a corrective agency, I can not do better than quote from the work of Prof. Holcombe, one of the Harvard economic studies, entitled "Public Ownership of Telephones on the Continent of Europe." After stating the theory of competition in relation to prices generally, he speaks of the telephone service:

> The difficulty with the theory of competitive rates in the telephone business is that the liberty of choice between rival undertakings is illusory. No two competing systems can offer the same range of communication. The subscribers to one system will have no means of conversing with those to the other. Consequently the prospective subscriber is not free to compare the price levels and conditions of service of the rival undertakings. He is compelled to join that system to which are already connected those persons with whom he most desires to converse.
> Moreover, unless he is so fortunate as to find all those persons with whom he desires to converse connected to the same system, he can not choose between rival services without being thereby deprived of the possibility of effecting a certain proportion of the communications which he would like to carry on by means of the telephone. The utility of the telephone lies in its marvelous power of transmitting the spoken word and reproducing it at a distance. The greater the number of persons who are enabled to converse with one another, regardless of intervening space, by means of a telephone system the greater is the utility of the system. The most useful telephone system would be one which, like the Postal Service, reaches everybody. Whatever excludes a portion of the community from participating in the benefits of a telephone system impairs by so much its usefulness. Now, a competitive undertaking does just that. The subscribers to each undertaking are debarred from carrying on telephonic conversations with the subscribers to the other undertaking. If there are several competing systems, the impairment of the usefulness of the service is correspondingly greater. If there were as many sellers of telephone service as buyers, and all were determined to remain in the business, the telephone would have no usefulness at all.

Since the policy of free competition offers no adequate assurance of reasonable rates for telephone service, the question at once arises, How shall they be determined? The only alternative to competition is monopoly of some sort. The forces of demand and supply will operate under a régime of monopoly, as under one of free competition, but the results will not be the same. In the latter case the interests of the monopolist will ordinarily lead him to fix his rates at a level which is intended to yield him the maximum of profit. Having adopted a tentative schedule of rates, he carefully observes the extent of the demand for his services at those rates and readjusts them, if need be, until the actual sale of his services verifies his calculations. His purpose always is to make as large as possible the surplus that remains after deducting from his gross receipts all the expenses of rendering the service. Consequently, under a régime of unregulated private monopoly rates are certain to be exorbitant.

In the telephone business, to this disadvantage, from the viewpoint of the community of monopolies in general, must be added a further special disadvantage. Not only is there no protection against exorbitant rates, but also there is no security that the distribution of the total charges beween the different classes of telephone users will be made on a basis calculated to promote the widest utility of the service, such as it is. For the criterion of a sound monopolistic rate policy is not the greatest utility of the service but the greatest profit of the monopolist. Unfortunately the two do not coincide. There will, for example, be no incentive to extend the service to wider circles of users unless such an extension will increase the gross receipts more than it will increase the operating expenses. The enhanced profits, therefore, which the monopolist will obtain from those users whose demand for the service is least elastic will not be put into extensions for the benefit of those whose demand is more elastic and to whom, consequently, a small reduction in price would mean a great increase in satisfaction. Monopoly rates will not enable the community at large to derive from the telephone service the maximum of satisfaction. Therefore they are not reasonable rates.

Two courses are open to the public authorities in order to protect the interests of the community at large. They may intrust the management of the monopoly to a private monopolist, who will be expected to adopt a policy of unreasonable rates. They may then attempt to set a limit to his unreasonableness by prescribing in advance the highest rates that he may lawfully charge. They may even provide for later reductions of rates when profits shall exceed a certain amount. Finally, they may secure a certain measure of compensation to the community for the distress caused by the unreasonableness of the rates, such as they may be, by stipulating for a share of the monopoly profits.

The alternative is for the public authorities themselves to administer the monopoly, and thus preserve in their own hands complete power to take whatever steps they may deem expedient in order to secure to the community the enjoyment of reasonable telephone rates.

His final conclusions, after a complete survey of the Continent, are:

In the telephone business competition is a failure. Considered as an automatic arrangement for maintaining an accurate adjustment of the supply of telephone facilities to the demand, it easily gets out of order. So long as it remains in order its effect is to diminish the utility of the service to render which telephone facilities are created. For a while it is capable of bringing about low rates and stimulating a rapid development. Sooner or later, however, the self-interest of the competitors or the disillusionment of the public authorities will cause the termination of competition and the substitution of a régime of monopoly. This has been the result everywhere in Europe where competition has once existed, except in Stockholm, and in Stockholm the bankruptcy of the private company or the purchase of its business by the Government is only a matter of time. Competition as a permanent status in the telephone business is neither desirable nor possible.

REGULATION.

Mr. Chairman, there are many things to be predicated of regulation, of course, and I shall make no attempt to cover them all. Among them, however, are some effects that are certain. A régime of regulation will—

(a) Eliminate competition.

(b) Strongly tend to crystallize the rates and, with them, local discriminations.

(c) Remove personal discriminations.

(d) Limit extension to places of sufficiently high profit to attract private finance.

(e) Thus defeat the attainment of the maximum extension of social service.

The first three propositions are exemplified in our railway history of the last 10 years and in that of England for 20 years. The progressive decline in average rates, which began with the introduction of the railway, continued in both countries to the time when the State exerted its power and converted the unstable rates into legal rules. In neither England nor here has the average rate fallen substantially since. I say such rates, including any local discriminations, crystallize under regulation fixing them as rules of the State. The shipping interests, unable to set one railway underbidding the other, urge reductions upon the regulating power, only to be met by the proprietary defenses of the railway owners. And they, when trying to secure rate increases, are met by the defenses of the shipping interests. The antagonistic forces are so nearly equal that, impeded by the complexity of the subject matter and the inertia of court procedure, they meet only in an impasse, with a triumph usually in favor of the status quo.

But there is a more profound reason for the impasse thus reached and the practical inability to reduce rates under regulation. It is the instinct of respect for private property so highly developed in modern civilization. The stockholders earnestly defend their right to the profits their capital and enterprise have created; the effect of reducing the rates renders so uncertain what the rate of profit may be; moreover, its reduction affects not merely the dividend they are to receive but the commercial value of their capital itself, a reduction of from 12 to 6 per cent, cutting such value in two for purposes of sale; all these deterrents, with the ability of the conductor of the enterprise to suppress or disguise those inner facts of his business, of which he alone has intimate and real knowledge, usually leave but one safe recourse for the regulating tribunal, and that is to heed the inevitable doubt in the proprietor's favor. Count von Bismarck has summarized the weakness of the regulating theory as follows:

The attempts to bring about reform by laws have shown the futility of hoping for a satisfactory improvement through legal measures, without trenching materially on established rights and interests.

State ownership is necessary to attain unity and economy under conditions in harmony with the public welfare and to secure direct attention to public interests which do not permanently find sufficient furtherance and protection in the hands of private corporations whose object is gain. The inadequacy of private management and State supervision becomes daily more obvious.

Mr. Chairman, efficacy has never been claimed for regulation as a method for obtaining the maximum social service. Take the case of the Bell Co. controlling the Chicago & Milwaukee Telegraph Co., which raised its rates per telegram from 15 to 25 cents, abridging its former social service nearly 50 per cent. Contrast this with the British post office in 1885 reducing its rate from 24 cents to 12 cents and increasing the number of messages about 60 per cent. In the former case there was an increase, perhaps a justifiable increase, of profits to the private owners; in the latter there was a slight loss in the revenues, but a tremendous gain in public service rendered. It comes back, then, to the fundamental principle involved in the rule of private financiering. Regulation is helpless to invest the private investor with a public-service motive; and without that motive, not the maximum social service, but naturally enough for the investor, the maximum return on his investment, is the rational rule of conduct.

Conservative students of the telephone subject do not propose or consider regulation as a means to attaining the maximum of utilization in this service. I shall quote again from the work of Prof. Holcombe on this subject. He says:

The great advantage of the ownership of business undertakings by the community lies in the power that goes with possession. While the ownership of business of general public importance remains in private hands there is no protection for the ordinary economic interests of consumers except by free competition or by public regulation. In the telephone business the former is neither desirable nor possible. The latter may be obtained in only two ways: (1) By special contract between the private owners and the public authorities; (2) by direct legislative action, subject to appeal to the courts for the protection of individual rights. Under either method of public regulation the antagonism of interest between the private monopolist and the consumer may be subdued but is never removed. It was in order to possess complete control over the management of the telephone business that the Governments of Europe adopted the policy of public ownership. By retaining complete control in their own hands those Governments have had the opportunity to adopt methods for the establishment of rates and the maintenance of service that would have been impossible under any form of private ownership. In a business such as the telephone, the best security for the establishment of reasonable rates is to give those who are to pay the rates a voice in their making, and the best security for the accurate adjustment of the supply of telephone facilities to the demand is to give to those who are to use the facilities a share of the responsibility for their creation.

But once it is recognized that in a particular industry the hypothetical alternative of free competition is an illusion it becomes evident that the community's saving by the assumption of the risks of the enterprise is not a mere recompense for the sacrifice of a more rapid rate of industrial progress, but a clear gain. For under the actual alternative to public ownership in such an industry, namely, a regulated private monopoly, there is no greater security for sound industrial progress than under public ownership, and it is certain that at least a portion of the advantages of industrial progress will be appropriated by the monopolist solely by virtue of the fact that he is a monopolist. The great merit of public ownership, therefore, as an agent of production is that under the proper industrial conditions it fulfills more economically than any other method of industrial organization the direct purpose of production; that is, the supply of the consumer with the kind and quantity of goods that he desires.

The telephone industry can only attain its highest utility when managed as an exclusive monopoly in a given territory. The market for telephone service comprises the whole body of individuals in the territory covered by a connected telephone system and in practice can be limited for administrative purposes without great inconvenience by the political boundaries of a country. Hence, when owned by the Government, owner and consumer are identical. Furthermore, the mechanical nature of the service and the stability of the demand for the service make possible accurate prediction of the demand by statistical methods. In those industries in which these conditions are present the policy of public ownership is best fitted to enable the community to avoid both the periodical overproduction of free competition and the perpetual underproduction of private monopoly.

REGULATION APPLIED.

An illustration may be given of the futility of expecting postal rates through the medium of regulation. The following data are taken from the opinion of such a public-service commission, dated December 30, 1911, and relate to a city of approximately 600,000 population:

Number of phones		43,000
Value of property		$5,665,729
Number of messages		42,701,000
For the year the operating revenue was		$1,507,550.56
While the operating expenses were		645,960.83
So that the net operating revenue was		861,589.73
Deducting these charges:
Rentals	$3,701.82
Taxes, property	79,898.72
Taxes, franchise	40,754.44
Depreciation (6 per cent)	337,065.01
		461,419.99
Leaves the net income		400,169.74

Which is less than 8 per cent on the amount invested.

Considering the nature of the business and the risks to which it is subject, and guided in a measure by the conclusions of the railroad commissioners of Wisconsin and the public-service commission for the first district of New York on the same or a similar question, we are of opinion that 8 per cent is a fair and reasonable return on an investment in telephone property. We also think that for property of this character the allowance for depreciation should be about 6 per cent on an average. In this case, therefore, we are not so much concerned to bring about a reduction in the company's net income as we are to see that the rates which produce that income are fairly and equitably distributed among the users of the telephone service.

Analyzing the above data we get:

Number of messages per capita	71
Number for United States	156
Number of messages per phone:
Independents	2,013
Bell system	1,828
For this city	993
	Cents.
Receipt per message, independents	0.88
Receipt per message, Bell system	1.86
Receipt per message, this city	3.53
Expenditures per message:
Operating cost	1.50
Rentals, taxes, depreciation	1.08
Profits	.95

In this city the social charge for the service is four times the average of the independents and nearly twice that of the Bell system. The effect is to reduce the use of the phone, in the number of calls, to about one-half the average for the United States.

In such a case it is clear that the Postmaster General would reason thus: The phone in "A" city is yielding only half the average call service. Its rates are from two to four times the average rates. Less than 20 per cent of the operating expenses—exchange operators—would be increased by a double average of calls per phone, and the item for rentals, taxes, depreciation, and profit would not have to be enlarged. I believe if I reduce the rate 50 per cent the number of calls will double, thus leaving my gross income unchanged. My exchange-operator item may double—from $125,000 to $250,000—and the manual exchange added to one-half, a gain in expense of $143,000 (19). But as I have interest charges at 3 per cent only to meet—$170,000—and my net income is $400,000, I can afford to take the chance on the traffic doubling, going up to normal, if the rates are reduced by 50 per cent.

This is indeed just what the postal motive did with the parcel rates. And thinking men will justify the Postal Department in acting on such principles. That is, they would approve the Postmaster General in taking a necessary experimental chance on the net income if the facts rendered probable a doubling of the public service.

But what would a regulating tribunal do in such a case? Would it take such a chance? Would it have a right to take such a chance and cut the net returns down from 8 per cent, the rental value of private capital, to 3 per cent?

Obviously it could do nothing of the kind, because it would be wrong to take the chance of reducing the return to private capital below its fair rental value, which in this case the commission held to be 8 per cent.

Let us see what would happen if the regulating tribunal should order the normalizing of these rates. It is assumed that if the rates were cut in half the service would double. Thus the receipts would not be changed. But the exchange-operator item would double, that is, advance $125,000. To this must be added, say, 8 per cent on the cost of adapting the exchange or switchboard to handling twice the number of calls, say, $600,000, making an increase of expense amounting to $173,000. Deduct this from the $400,000 of net receipts and you have but 4 per cent left to pay charges on capital. This would be ample for the Postmaster General, but only half the amount necessary to secure private capital. In this case, which is fairly representative of the larger cities of the country, it is apparent that whether the telephone capital has to pay 4 per cent or 8 per cent determines whether the rates can be reduced one-half and the service doubled.

But the difficulty for private capital would not end even here. Stockholm and San Francisco each have more than 20 telephones per 100 population. The city whose experience I am giving has about 7 per 100. If the rates were cut in half, might not the number of phones increase; probably double? There would be an effective demand equal to approximately doubling the plant. How should the private financier secure this new capital; on a promise of merely 4 or 5 per cent? A remedial theory must be such as to maintain the vital conditions of the institution to which it is applied; one of the principal conditions of telephone life is new capital. We have seen the regulating theory break down in this very respect as applied to our railways. It would break down even more conspicuously if applied to the telephone agencies of our large cities with the object of securing those popular rates and service extension rationally attainable by the postal system.

From this case it appears, clearly enough, that the law of increasing returns can only be taken advantage of, to its realizable limits, by the public financier operating under a rational public service motive. The Bell system, for example, claims 8 per cent as a proper return. The Public Service Commission concedes this. There will probably be few, if any, cases where it can be clearly shown that the companies are getting more. And so the program of substantial rate reduction through regulation is shown to be impracticable on its face.

Naturally enough, sir, the managers, for the most part, when confronted by a proposal to postalize, object and point to the alternative of regulation. But this attitude on their part, it is not considered unfair to suggest, is dictated rather by private than by social considerations. Postalization puts an end to their power. Regulation may or may not curtail them in a degree, while the stability of their monopoly is actually augmented by regulation, bringing with it an increment to the value of their securities. In this connection it ought to be remembered that, whatever our hesitation may be on administrative grounds to applying the State principle to all forms of natural monopoly in obedience to the principle that "private monopolies are intolerable," such hesitation need not be felt as to postal subjects given the postal department. It may be confidently asserted that no bank or railroad organization, private or public, has better assurances of administrative efficiency to offer.

OBJECTS OF RELIEF.

Mr. Chairman, having completed the analyses of the economics and the traffic effects of our systems of communication by wire, let us put the direct question, What, if any, are the deficiencies to be corrected? Answering this question just as directly, I wish to say that, while our postal rates are as low as those of other countries, we find that in the United States—

(a) The telegraph charge averages more than double,

(b) The local-call phone charge about double,

(c) The toll and long-distance telephone charge about four times, the rates generally prevailing in the principal countries of the world.

Proceeding on the assumption that our postal system can do as well for the wire forms of communication as it does for the letter—that is, can handle the wire messages as cheaply, compared with these countries, as it does the letter—it is suggested that these forms of communication should be postalized; that is, the postal agency should be permitted to conduct these communications in order to normalize the rates and extend the service to the great body of the people.

Proceeding, again, on the further assumption that the abnormal rates operate to abridge the total service rendered in the same percentage that the rates are excessive—a moderate statement, I think—then the Nation has short-work claims on such services, as follows:

(a) The telegraph: Number of messages, 175,000,000.

(b) Local phone service: Number of messages, 7,500,000,000.

(c) Toll and long distance: Number of messages, 300,000,000.

That a twice normal rate will inhibit at least half the traffic, or, stated in the reverse way, that cutting the rates in half will double the traffic in a service for which, like these, there is a universal and constant demand, is an assumption sustained by postal experience with the telegram, with the letter, and now with the postal-express parcel, not to speak of definite experiences with the passenger traffic.

The difference between the potential traffic and the traffic which will actually move under abnormal rates is aptly illustrated by the parcel post. In 1909 the total number of shipments by express was found to be 300,000,000, in round numbers. In the year ending July 1, 1914, the express receipts indicated a traffic of 317,758,118 parcels. The postal-express traffic at present, as indicated by the count taken in October, is 300,000,000. (Includes only parcels of 1 pound and up, as indicated by the count in October, 1914.) The following table presents the effect of the postal-express service in saving potential traffic that was "killed" by the express rates:

Express shipments, 1914	317,758,118
Postal-express shipments, 1914	300,000,000
Total	617,758,118

Thus, one-half of the potential traffic was sacrificed by the express rates, only to be saved by the postal agency after 40 years of denial to the public of an institution they were as much entitled to as the Postal System itself. In brief the Nation has been denied the right to ship half its small-shipment traffic merely because a private agency that could not make rates to move the whole traffic has insisted upon a private discharge of a public function.

The doubling, or more probably the expected quadrupling, of the number of electrical communications is not predicated merely on the demands of present patrons, for the effect of prohibitive rates is not merely to reduce the number of calls by present subscribers, but to seriously reduce the number of subscribers themselves.

The Bell phone shows 1,795 calls per annum, against 2,055 calls for the independents, and yet the Bell phone is largely a business phone, where the user should hesitate less about the cost of the message than the user of a residence phone concerned only with the nonrevenue-producing affairs of the home.

It is interesting to compare the telephone development in residence phones under high and low rates. We may take Washington, D. C., and Cumberland, Md., my home town, as examples: In Cumberland the minimum annual residence rate (unlimited) is $18; the population (1910), 21,839; and the number of residence subscribers, 2,736, which equals 125 phones to each 1,000 persons. In Washington, D. C., the minimum rate for residence is $48 unlimited service, and the measured $30, limited to one call a day. The population for 1910 was 331,069, and the number of residence phones 27,676, or 83 phones to each 1,000 persons, a difference in favor of the lower Cumberland rate of 46 per cent. And yet it is probably true that Washington, with its greater social wealth, would rank much higher in phones per capita than Cumberland, under the influence of the lower rate (21).

It is true that the rate renders the telegram merely an incident to some calamity, like death, and so forth, for the working classes. But the use of the telephone, which is an hourly convenience if not a necessity, is at present confined to a small percentage of the homes of the country. The proportion of telephones is 1 to each 11 persons. If the number of office or business phones be deducted from this proportion, it is indeed doubtful whether more than 1 family in 6 enjoy this convenience.

Now, the Postal object is not merely to confer equal privileges in form, but to effectuate equality in practice. It, therefore, so organizes its service and formulates its rates as to remove any economic barriers to their use. The poor man, the very poor man, can actually utilize any form of the Postal Service. Its rates are adapted to his means. Mr. Vail, president of the Western Union Telegraph Co., declares:

> There is a road to every man's door; there should be a telephone to every man's house.

The parallel is indisputable, but its complementary fact should also be noted. It was society, and not any privately financed monopoly, that built these roads. He also adds, apologetically for the Bell, that the system must be—

> Under common control * * * it must be sufficiently strong to constitute practically one system, intercommunicating, interdependent, universal.

Now, is this possible in the United States? Sir, I feel justified in saying that it is possible here, if nowhere else, on account of our higher wage levels; and the Swiss tariff system. I submit, affords demonstration of this statement. But of this the point fundamental—indeed, the whole objective of the discussion, the supportive facts—must be developed later.

METHOD OF RELIEF.

THE TELEGRAPH AND TELPHONE SERVICES INTERDEPENDENT.

Mr. Chairman, these two methods of communication are economically and operatively so interrelated and so identical in characteristics that the only difference which now suggests itself is that the communication in one case is addressed to the eye and in the other to the ear. The mechanism, the wire, and the active principle—electricity—are the same for both; moreover, it is a fact at present that the same telephone wire may be and actually is simultaneously engaged in conveying both the forms of communication, especially for longer distances, where the telegram formerly was the more efficacious. Coupled with this fact that every telephone wire is in fact or potentially a telegraph wire is the circumstance of conclusive economic importance. Since the telephone wires permit the discharge of the double function without interference one with the other, the duplication of the physical agencies will involve a doubling of the expenses of each service—except for the points of large telegraphic traffic, where the skilled telegrapher will be needed as a supplement to the exchange personnel. I shall leave to Mr. Theodore N. Vail, president alike of the Western Union and the Bell telephone system, the task of completing this statement. I quote from the report of the Western Union for 1912:

> There are estimated to be less than about 5,750,000 rural habitations in this country. The Bell system has over 3,200,000 rural telephone stations; that is, more than half the rural habitations are connected by exchange wires with central offices of rural centers and these central offices, by means of branch telephone lines, with and form a part of the Bell telephone system. These branch lines extend to substantially every rural center. They are not used to nearly their capacity. The lines and the operating staff have to be maintained for one purpose. Under a joint working between the telegraph and telephone, these facilities, both plant and operating, could be utilized without appreciable extra cost for telephoning the occasional telegraph message. In this way a telegraph service could be given to practically every center of population in the country and by means of the rural telephones made to reach nearly every habitation.
> If the public desire, as they do, not only improved facilities but additional methods of intercommunication, and eventually cheaper rates, these benefits can only be obtained through a combined use of plant, and to bring about such a combination, not only the purpose but the reasons must be understood, and if it results in a broad combined system extending over the whole country, such a system is inherent to the object to be accomplished and it can not be accomplished in any other way.
> It is an axiom that the cost of operating and the cost of construction and maintenance of plant facilities must be borne by the service. If, then, plant facilities are only partially utilized the cost of service is greater and so must be the charges. If additional use of facilities is made, then the cost of service is less and the charges can be reduced.
> If the public insist upon a duplication of plant for each kind of service, then the cost of these plants must be borne by the service and the public must pay the cost. If you hire two carriages to carry two loads that one would carry as well, the two carriages must be paid for. No individual or corporation can be expected to, nor can they be required to, provide a permanent service to the public at less than cost and a fair profit. Waste of facilities and waste of duplication come out of the public, either through the additional cost of service which must be maintained or through the loss of the investment made on the facilities which were unnecessary.

In a like report for the Bell Telephone system in 1911, Mr. Vail illustrates the complementary character of the two services with a chart.

And then he makes the following observations as to the operative and economic advantages of their unification of ownership and management:

> The joint use of such lines and operatives would be a source of economy. At busy offices and on busy circuits, the circuits could be "composited" for the simultaneous use for telegraph and telephone purposes. Each service would require its distinct operating force and its distinct offices, as the services rendered by the telegraph and the telephone are functionally and fundamentally different, although both use wire circuits. The telephone makes up a circuit and places it at the use of the customers, who do the communicating, i. e., it leases its circuits to others for personal communication. The telegraph, by its own operators, performs all the services of collecting, transmitting, and delivering messages, i. e., it transmits over its circuits, for others, personal communications.
> The greatest economy and advantage would come from the "compositing" or simultaneous use of one system of circuits for the two services, eliminating entirely one of the wire systems. The advance in the state of the art of "compositing" lines for joint use of the telephone and telegraph has been very marked in the very recent past.
> The accompanying daigram [not printed] illustrates a small section each of the telephone and telegraph system. It is self-explanatory.
> The diagram shows that the existing wire mileage of the present telephone toll circuits and telegraph plants, brought up to standard construction with some provision for deficiencies or extensions, if "composited" or used jointly, would for all practical purposes be the equivalent of two plants, each of the same mileage, one for telephone and one for telegraph; or, to put it another way, the wire mileage necessary to give the same service need be about half the combined wire mileage of the two systems separately operated, as now.
> The annual gross revenue from either a telephone or a telegraph system should be approximately 33 per cent of the total cost of or the investment in plant. If in two systems of equal size one plant were eliminated and both services were performed over the other, the percentage of joint revenue to plant would be substantially doubled, or 65 per cent. To put it in another way: The maintenance of a wire plant costs about 30 per cent of the annual gross revenue from that plant. The simultaneous use of a plant for both purposes would mean maintenance of one wire system against the doubled revenue from both services, or a decrease in maintenance alone of about 15 per cent of the gross revenue. In addition to these savings there would be the savings of the capital charges and of taxes on plant, which would be made unnecessary. This brings within the realm of possibility a reduction of from 20 per cent to 25 per cent in the gross charges or gross revenue without affecting the profits of the business.

In order to avoid confusion, it must be distinctly borne in mind that the telephone service referred to here is the toll or long-distance service and not the circuits of the exchange service, which could not be used for any other purpose. This toll or long-distance service is so intimately interwoven and interdependent both in operation and use with the telephone-exchange service that it could not be separated, but the operation of the toll circuits in connection with the exchange circuits would not interfere with their use for telegraph purposes by a regularly organized telegraph staff.

These are the possibilities, fraught with all sorts of advantage to the public.

Mr. Chairman, I think it sufficiently obvious that the telegraph and telephone are not two services, but really one service; as, indeed, they represent besides but one function, the function of intercommunication. Accordingly, it may be that they will require the application of but one policy and method of treatment.

We have seen that our problem is threefold, viz, the extension of postal relief to the three forms of electrical communication—the local call, the long-distance conversation, and the telegram—which I name in the priority of their importance. It appears that the postalization of but one agency, the telephonic network, may be effective for all these forms of relief. But let us look more carefully into this important matter by reviewing the subject in its constructive relations.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. Chairman, having concluded that on both economic and social grounds these agencies of communication require public or, more exactly speaking, postal financiering, it is now in order to consider the subject in its constructive aspects.

The postal method: The examples of nearly all the principal countries point in but one direction as to the agency which should be employed. It is the postal. Its truly wonderful genius for doing little services cheaply and well is now winning for it the express function in the United States, and in the following countries has added the telephone and the telegraph to the mail piece:

LIST OF COUNTRIES OWNING BOTH TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE COUNTRIES.	COUNTRIES OWNING TELEGRAPHS ONLY.
Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Bulgaria, New Caledonia, Dahomey, Denmark (at least part—state, private, and municipal), Egypt (part), Formosa, France, Tunis, Germany, Switzerland, Great Britain, Sweden (greater part), Greece, South Africa (Union of), French Guinea, Servia, Hungary, Roumania, India (British—state and private), India (Dutch—state and private), French Indo-China (Government), Italy (state and private), Norway (greater part), Japan (including Korea), New Zealand, Luxemburg, the Netherlands (state, municipal, and private), Russia (state and private), Siam (state and private).	Abyssinia (Ethiopia), Alaska, Argentina, Bolivia (not all), Brazil, Chile (nearly all), Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Mexico, Montenegro, Paraguay, Persia, Peru, Portugal, Spain, Turkey, Uruguay.

Mr. Chairman, all the civilized—yes, almost all the uncivilized—countries have postalized the electrical message, and it will be observed that Spain and Brazil only among the greater countries join the United States in licensing out the telephone agencies of communication to private parties. England naturally has been the last to yield, but since January 1, 1912, even she has assumed the entire postal function of conveying intelligence by taking over the Bell service. Some of the Provinces in Canada took the step a few years ago, so that our situation is now so exceptional as to be actually noteworthy. The causes for our condition are not different from those which for 40 years denied us the parcel post, namely, the "tory" and the "system" largely consequent upon the private financiering of these natural monopolies.

THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE STRUCTURES.

Construction de novo of the wire agencies, as a program, is denied us, of course, on the grounds of national economy as well as on sound political consideration. It therefore becomes necessary to compare existing structures and determine their adaptability for economical postal management and the purposes of the desired relief.

There is considerable likeness between the postal and wire mediums, even in their physical methods. If the wire be taken as the path of the electrical communication, the parallel is almost perfect. Both systems are susceptible of classification into units of: (a) Number of offices; (b) number of employees engaged; and (c) miles of routes of communication. Let us see how the two compare in these respects; I say "the two," for they are not three in number. The telegraph and telephone are but one agency, since the same wire—that is, the telephone wire—now carries the written and the spoken communication at the same time.

Number of offices.
Postal	64,000
Telegraph, commercial	8,499
Telephone, public exchanges	11,515
	20,014
Number of employees.
Postal	290,701
Telegraphs (land)	35,639
Telephone (94,360 women)	183,361
	219,000
Miles of route.
Postal, railway and water	436,469
Postal, rural routes	1,021,492
Postal, city carrier routes (estimated at 40 per cent of daily travel of city carriers, which was 375,000 miles)	150,000
	1,607,961
Telephone—toll pole line, exchange pole line (toll and exchange wire, 20,248,326 miles)	671,686
Telegraphs—land pole line (telegraph wire, 1,814,196; excludes 314,329 miles of wire wholly owned and operated by railways for their own business)	247,528
	919,214
Postal receipts (year ending July 1, 1914)	$287,934,565
Surplus	$4,376,463
Telegraph receipts	$56,293,469
Telephone (receipts from telephone companies having an annual income of less than $5,000 not reported)	$255,081,234
	$311,374,703

The extent or spread of these structures has been thus summarized in order to give the student a total glance for preliminary comparison. Each must be subjected later to minute analysis. I wish now merely to observe that the postal organization and structure far exceeds the other agencies. The postal personnel exceeds the wire by 30 per cent; the post routes exceed the duplicated telephone and telegraph pole line by 43 per cent; and the number of post offices—64,022—exceed the commercial wire offices and exchanges by about 220 per cent. In revenue or gross charges only does the wire communication exceed the popular agency. No one will contend, notwithstanding, that the social service of the wires equals that of the postal system.

Attention is invited to the fact that the pole-line mileage—247,528 miles—of Western Union and Postal Telegraph, and the interurban and long-distance telephone wires triplicate each other to the extent of their pole mileage. If some 50,000 miles of toll or interurban wire of the independents are added to the Bell, we have a long-distance phone mileage of 221,000 miles, identical in extent with the Western Union. Therefore telegraphic communications are feasible over four routes:

First. The Western Union. (The Western Union pole line was 221,000 miles according to its statement.)

Second. The Postal Telegraph Co. (The Postal Telegraph pole line was 67,000 miles; probably largely including the use of telephone wires.)

Third. The Bell and independent toll and long-distance wires, 221,000 miles. (The Bell toll pole line in 1912 was 171,161; the independent is estimated.)

Fourth. Entire telephone network toll and exchange pole line, 671,686 miles.

Mr. Chairman, considered merely from the standpoint of their value in economic use to the postal system, however, the Postal, or Mackay, telegraph lines would have to be rejected because of their insufficient extension. The Post Office would have to more than treble the Mackay mileage to do a general service. The Western Union is not subject to the same objection; it has the extension as a telegraph agency merely. But investigation discloses that only two-fifths of its wire—600,000 miles—is copper, so that three-fifths—900,000 miles—of its system would not be susceptible of satisfactory telephonic use. The third system, the Bell and independent toll or long-distance lines in combination, suffices in extent and mechanical construction for both telegraphic and telephonic objects, being entirely copper and having the requisite range and extent. All of which means that if we wished to give relief merely to telegraph users we might do so by the use of the Western Union. If we wished to extend relief as well to toll and long-distance users, the interurban and long-distance phone system would alone suffice. But if in harmony with other countries we wished to extend relief to users, actual and potential, of all the forms of communication by wire, we could do so completely by the single expedient of utilizing the Bell and independent telephone systems, since the telephonic network is potentially a telegraph network as well.

Recurring to the estimates of communication services now lost to the public by relatively prohibitive wire rates, let us see in what measure these losses could be saved by the different methods of wire acquisition possible. Let the telegraphic service loss equal 14 per cent of the total loss, the toll and long-distance 21 per cent, and the local phone service 65 per cent, in all 100 per cent, then the following gains in service results may be predicated of postal acquisition:

	Per cent.
(a) By taking over the Western Union, 14 per cent on the telegraphic	14
(b) By taking over additionally the Postal, or Mackay, telegraph	00
(c) By acquisition of telephonic, long-distance, and toll lines, 14 per cent on telegraphic and 21 per cent on toll and long-distance service	35
(d) By acquisition of the entire telephone network, 14 per cent on telegraphic service, 21 per cent on toll and long-distance, and 65 per cent on local telephone service	100

The costs of propositions (a) and (b) collectively would be about $144,000,000 on the basis of their capitalization; of proposition (c), about $200,000,000; and of proposition (d), about $1,000,000,000, on the like basis. But let us consider these phases of the subject matter with a little more detail.

COST OF ACQUISITION OF TELEPHONE NETWORK.

The census of 1912 gives the following data as to the finances of the telephone network (telephone companies of less than $5,000 annual income not included):

Capital stock	$586,763,879
Funded debt	404,530,236
Mortgages, floating debt, and accounts payable	71,742,634
	1,063,036,749
Cash and current assets	96,618,255
Net liabilities		966,418,494

An item of $1,081,433,227 is given as "Cost of construction and equipment," but how much of this represents values which have lapsed through use or obsolescence is not stated. The figures in the table represent the following local and long-distance telephone structure:

	1912
	Total.	Bell system.	All other systems.
Number of systems	1,916	176	1,740
Miles of single wire	19,019,391	15,133,186	3,886,205
Miles of pole line	671,686	353,422	318,264
Number of public exchanges	11,515	5,853	5,662
Number of telephones	7,326,748	5,087,027	2,239,721

It should be noted that the above pole line embraces something over 200,000 miles of toll and long distance, or, better, interurban wires, corresponding to the distribution of the railway network of the country. As already pointed out, it would meet the requirements of a national postal telegraphic system as well as the conversation uses to which it is now put.

The commercial telegraphic network in 1907 reached 6,828 offices and the railway network 22,282. Generally speaking, by far the greater number of railway offices are in towers and otherwise inaccessible, not to say so engrossed with the prior claims of railway messages that the nonrailway public is hardly to be said to secure a real telegraphic service. As opposed to this, the telephone network, through the Bell alone, reaches 70,000 places, and probably nearly 100,000 places as a whole. As against the 6,828 distributing offices of the telegraphic network, the telephonic network possessed in 1907 some 43,819 public and private exchanges—offices from which to dispatch or receive the telegram—and now some 9,000,000 phones through which instantaneous and economical collection and delivery of the message may be had. Another feature possessed by the telephonic network not possessed entirely by the telegraphic is that the former lines are copper, while but 40 per cent of the Western Union and an unknown proportion of the others are of such material. In consequence of this condition the telegraph lines would require almost complete reconstruction in order to be susceptible of telephonic usage. President Vail, of the Western Union, refers to this fact in his report for 1912. He says:

> No telegraph company could go into the telephone business without substantially reconstructing its telegraph plant to adapt it for toll or long-distance use, and, in addition, building exchange plants, involving an investment many times that of its telegraph plant.
> The two wires which are necessary for one telephone circuit can by multiplying be made into four, six, or eight telegraph circuits and can be used for both telegraph and telephone transmission at the same time.

And, again:

> A single telegraphic circuit or wire can not be used for telephonic purposes.

Another circumstance is that the telephonic lines are metallic circuits; that is, have the return wire necessary for the spoken message, while the telegraph lines do not, but rely on the "earth return," which is adequate for the telegram but unsuited for speech, except in uninhabited districts like Alaska, where the interferences of adjacent electrical industries are absent.

The practical effect of these differences is that the telegraphic network is fitted only to carry the telegram, with poorer collection and delivery facilities, while the telephonic network is adapted to carrying the telegram and also the conversation, and has the best collection and delivery facilities.

Stated in a more formal manner:

The telegraphic network will—

(a) Dispatch the telegram and

(b) Deliver it at, say, 7,000 places.

The telephonic network will—

(a) Dispatch the telegram and

(b) Deliver it, through 50,000 exchanges, at 100,000 places.

(c) Provide instantaneous and economical delivery through 9,000,000 phones.

(d) Provide toll conversations.

If, in connection with these patent advantages of the telephonic network, economy in operation is also to be considered, it ought to be observed that in maintaining and personneling the telephonic network for telephonic uses the operating and capital expenses will have been met and discharged for the telegraphic service as well. Except for the employment of telegraph operators at points of high density, and the telegraphic instruments necessary in the telegraphic traffic, no additional expense would be incurred for the telegraph service. Indeed, this element is involved in a triplicate way on the telegraphic lines. To the extent that the Postal Co. duplicates the lines of the Western Union we should in effect be paying two bills of maintenance expense; first, on the Western Union, discharging only the telegraphic function, and then again on the Postal, a mere duplicate of the former. If to this be added the circumstance that the toll telephonic network left in private hands could give a telegraphic service, practically without cost to itself, which, whatever its rates, supplemented by its instantaneous telephonic delivery and collection, would take the most lucrative business from the Postal Telegraph agency, it becomes evident that the proposition to acquire the telegraphic in preference to the telephonic network can reflect only a superficial view, rational 30 years ago, but wholly untenable since the interurban and long-distance telephone wire has been developed. To take over the telegraph wires at this time would for these reasons be only to invite unnecessary failure and, perhaps, postal bankruptcy.

A much more efficacious method of treating the telegraphic problem, if regarded alone, would be to use the interurban and long-distance telephone wires as we now use the railways. The following clause in the form of a bill or attached to the Postal appropriation bill is suggested for the purpose:

(a) The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed not later than the 1st day of July, 1915, to establish and conduct, at rates to be determined by him, a system of telegraphic communication by wire or otherwise which, so far as practicable, shall connect with all the points within the United States at which postal facilities may be established. And for this purpose he may use the telephone lines connecting such points, and it shall be the duty of the owners thereof to permit such use of such lines and render such service as may be required by the Postmaster General in the establishment and conduct of such system of electrical communication.

(b) The compensation to be paid the owners for the use of such telephone lines shall, in case of dispute as to the amount thereof, be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall consider the gross revenues derived by the owners from such lines, the amount of business done thereon by the Postmaster General, the cost of maintaining the same, a fair return on the investment, and the cost and value of any services rendered by such owners in the postal operation thereof.

(c) The Postmaster General shall have power to make such regulations as may be necessary to carry this section into effect.

The lines would still be used by the private owners for their telephone business and be maintained by them. Thus the expenses of upkeep would be divided probably about equally between the postal and the telephone uses, while the salaries of the operatives could be divided in the proportion that their time might be devoted to the telegraph and telephone functions. At points of dense traffic the postal system would have its own operators and offices. The Interstate Commerce Commission might determine the compensation to be paid the owners in case of dispute. I have no question that under such a system telegraphic rates as low as any in the world might be obtained and the telegraphic function be made to realize its maximum service to the people of the United States. In his argument against the acquisition of the telephone lines by the Government Mr. Vail, president of the Bell System and at that time president of the Western Union Telegraph Co., in the report of the Bell System for 1913, observes:

The only practicable way for the Post Office to use the telephone lines for telegraphic service would be to lease the telegraph rights, much as the Post Office Department now uses the railroad facilities for the mails. No other separated operation or control of the same wires for telegraph and telephone service would be practicable from either standpoint. The interurban toll lines and the exchange trunk lines and their equipments are necessarily so interwoven and used so interchangeably that it would be next to impossible to segregate them. While it is perfectly feasible to use wires for both telephone and telegraph service—and either the telephone circuit or the telegraph circuit could be looped into any office—the arrangement and distribution of the lines for both purposes must be under common control, and that the telephone. The manipulation of the lines is a telephonic proposition, not a telegraphic.

History of subject: In a preceding portion of this study a list has been given of the countries which have postalized the telephone along with the telegraph. In nearly every instance the postalization of the telephone service took place as a measure of protection against the encroachments of the telephone on the revenue of the postal telegraphs. It was foreseen that the telephone in private hands would make such inroads upon the telegraphic service as to seriously abridge, if not bankrupt, the postal operation.

Prof. Holcombe, of Harvard, in his work on Public Ownership of the Telephone, has developed the history of the subject in this respect quite clearly. I can not here go over his ground for each country, but I shall take the time to briefly review the history of the subject in England, whose example in all the fields of sociology has been so potent in our past history:

HISTORY OF ENGLISH TELEPHONE.

1870–1871. Transfer of telegraphs to State.

1879. Edison Telephone Co., of London, and the Bell negotiate with the post office for the sale of their patents without success.

1880. The two companies amalgamate. Courts decide that the post office has a monopoly of all wire communication under telegraph act of 1869.

1881. Postmaster general grants licenses to companies for local exchanges, subject to a royalty of 10 per cent of gross revenues, to replenish prospective losses of telegraph revenues. The Bell Co. holding patent rights refuses to sell the post office its phones. Post office refuses permission to construct interurban lines or local lines beyond 5 miles. Patents do not expire until 1890 and 1891. The post office established several telephone exchanges in provincial towns to enable it to dictate satisfactory public-service terms with the private licensees.

1882. Postmaster general refused to issue further licenses unless the licensees agreed to sell lines on request to the post office.

1883. Post office engages in active competition with the telephone companies. Post office constructs interurban lines and rents wires to the Bell at an annual rate of £10 per mile of wire plus one-half of receipts beyond that sum.

1884. Post office issues new licenses applicable to whole country; licensees not to receive or deliver written messages, but allowed to erect trunk or long-distance lines. Post office reserved right to compete by itself or through competitive licenses. New licenses to terminate in 1911, with the option in post office to purchase plants in 1890, 1897, or 1904. Bell required to charge the telegraph rate, 24 cents for interurban messages, giving one-half to the post office, to protect telegraph revenues.

1885–1888. The United Telephone Co. applied for the right to lay wires underground in streets. Refused. In spite of these protective measures the telegraphic service fell, and in 1885 the minimum rate was reduced from one to one-half shilling per message to save the business. The annual increase of telegrams had been 15 per cent; it jumped to 65 per cent the first year after the reduction.

1889. The privilege of erecting trunk lines connecting the various exchanges of the telephone companies is given. In this year there culminated the amalgamation of the companies into the National Telephone Co.

1891. Duke of Marlborough, in the name of the New Telephone Co., inaugurated a campaign for cheaper telephone services, but this company was captured by and was then merged in the National Telephone Co.

1892. Public discontent with telephone service and increase of private telephone competition with the Postal Telegraph becomes acute. Post office arranges to take over all trunk wires, which was accomplished in 1896. The local exchanges were required to make the trunk or long-distance connections without charge.

1897. Glasgow asks for license for municipal plant to compete with private company. Refused on grounds that two systems would prove wasteful and embarrass the post office in 1911, when postal acquisition might be undertaken.

1898. Select committee reports that telephone service "was not likely to become of general benefit so long as the present practical monopoly in the hands of a private company shall continue." Advised competition in local areas, to extend service, and avoid inflated price to Government in 1911. Resolution of Associations of Municipal Corporations that "the subject of telephone supply should be treated as an imperial and not as a local one, and that the postmaster general should have the sole control of the telephone system," and, on failure of the postmaster general to act, municipalities should have right to do so.

1899. Appropriation of $10,000,000 for development of postal telephone system. Municipalities authorized to operate local systems. License of National Telephone Co. made coextensive with other local licenses on the condition that the company should permit free interurban communication with new licenses in same locality—that is, all-round competition was inaugurated. The post office itself established a competitive system in London.

1901. Postmaster general coerced London company into granting free intercommunication for postal and company subscribers, and both established identical rates.

1905. Government contracted to take over the exchanges of the National Telephone Co. at the end of 1911.

1910. The effect of the encroachments of the telephone on the telegraph in number of messages and revenue had been such that the former became practically stationary, while the balance of the revenues showed a continuously increasing deficit:

Year.	Number of messages.	Deficit.
1900	89,576,961	£337,641
1907	89,493,000	652,055
1911	91,614,000	848,611

Meanwhile both the local and the trunk-line telephone service of the post office continued to show satisfactory financial results.

1912. On January 1 all exchanges of the private companies were taken over by the Government and postalized.

The English experience appears to be conclusive upon this point, namely, that an independent telegraph business, because of the growing inroads of the telephone traffic, is, for the future, of doubtful financial feasibility. Even in the United States the long-distance communications by phone exceed the telegraph, while in Germany the ratio is 5 to 1. Prudence therefore clearly dictates that our Postal System should deliberately avoid the telegraph wires and select instead the telephone lines. Such a choice would enable the Postmaster General to render both services at minimum rates, since he would have but one bill of expenditure to pay for their joint operation.

It may be suggested that the Government content itself with taking over the toll or long-distance wires, and through these do the telegraphic and long-distance or interurban business, leaving the local communication in private hands. It is first to be noted that both England and France tried this method, and found it unsatisfactory from want of harmony between the conflicting managements concerned in taking and delivering the message through the local termini. Another objection is that such a disposition would leave much the largest portion of the communicating problem unadjusted. If a postal simile may be employed, I should say that the telegram and long-distance messages compare with the local calls or conversations about as the Parcel Post Service compares with the letters and mail pieces—that is, scarcely compare at all—the local phone and the letter services being immeasurably the more important.

As the Bell system includes about three-fourths of the telephonic institution, it is apparent that its operations present conditions which are national in character. This deduction will graphically appear when we compare it with even the national telephone institutions of the greatest countries, which it overshadows in capital invested as well as in wire development and in gross expenditure and income. It is only our Postal System which exceeds it in scope and extent or the other characteristics of a national institution. It would seem to be unnecessary to indicate the similarity between the postal function of communication and that of the wires, while attention has already been given to the fact that but about one home in six can now be reached by the electrical communication. That this is due to the limitations natural to the rule of private financiering may be shown in a comparison of the universality of the postal agency under contemporaneous conditions. It is certain that under private financiering the wires are not destined to follow the mail carrier into the ordinary home. And yet, for even more pressing reasons of use and necessity, this is what they should do. It is as much the necessity and the right of society to have the effective means of sending its communications to the homes of the masses by wire as by human carriers, not to speak of the similar necessity and the right of the masses to enjoy such facilities for their own uses. Private financiering has exhausted its right to a longer lease of the agency to realize this end, even if it were to convince us of the sincerity of such a program. That such a program is impossible in its hands, but requires institutional motives and resources, which it can not be expected to command and which are yet available for society acting for itself, shall be the subject of our next chapter.

POSTAL SOCIO-ECONOMICS.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Vail, president alike of the Western Union and the Bell system, declares in one of his reports:

There is a road to every man's door; there should be a telephone to every man's house.

The parallel is indisputable, but its complementary fact should also be noted. It was society and not any privately financed monopoly that built these roads. He also adds apologetically for the Bell monopoly that the system must be—under common control * * *. It must be sufficiently strong to constitute practically one system, intercommunicating, interdependent, universal.

For such an object I make bold to say that nothing less than the social power and motive can be made adequate.

Now, the postal object is not merely to confer equal privileges in form, but to effectuate equality in practice. It therefore so organizes its service and formulates its rates as to remove any economic barriers to their use. The poor man, the very poor man, can actually utilize any form of the existing postal service. Its rates are adapted to his means.

The rate methods by which this is accomplished with the mail piece are well known, and it now becomes necessary to apply them to the different kinds of communication by wire and determine their availability for procuring like results in that field.

The rates: It must be obvious that the universality of the postal service has been accomplished through the lowness or social serviceableness of its rates. In treating the forms of wire communication, the local call, the toll, and the telegraphic message will be separately taken up.

Subscribers' rates: Academically speaking, a railway rate structure has two functions to perform:

(a) The function of the body of rates is to produce sufficient revenue to keep the property whole and pay operative and capital charges.

(b) The function of the particular rate is to move as much of the potential traffic as possible to which it relates without actual loss in the operating expense.

If function (a) should fail, transportation must ultimately cease, while if function (b) fails, transportation does not take place at all. What all this means in practice is that the railways have not found it practicable to move the traffic of the country with rates based upon the quantity of service rendered; that is, rates compounded of the average cost of service plus a proportionate apportionment of the fixed and capital charges. At first they tried this plan, but very shortly learned that an immense proportion of the potential, low-priced traffic, able to pay its share of the operating costs and a small proportion of the fixed charges, was not able to pay its full share of the fixed or capital charges. The consequence was that such traffic did not move at all, and the railway lost the slight gain over operating expenses which it might have secured, while society lost the service of having many of its commodities moved from their places of production to their natural market. The railways accordingly threw overboard the cost and capital-charge theory of rate making and adopted instead the system of class and commodity rates which universally obtains to-day. In other words, they have frankly espoused the principle that transportation rates, especially that proportion of them from which they derive their revenues for fixed and capital charges, must be levied, like taxes, according to the subject's capacity to pay; and so, if you will look into a freight car, you will observe shipments of equal weights and sizes moving on the same train from the same point of consignment to the same destination, each paying a different rate for what appears to be an identical service. Rates per 100 pounds actually vary from 95 cents for first class to 31 cents for the sixth class when consigned from St. Louis to points in Massachusetts, which is not an exceptional ratio. At first we may resent the idea that a private organization should formally assume and exercise the power to tax us, and this feeling doubtless has had much to do with the Government acquisition of the railways in other countries; but as necessity knows no law and a substantial part of transportation would have failed under cost-of-service rates, the American public has long acquiesced in this private taxing power.

It is worthy of note that only the railway has adopted this State or social principle in rate making. None of our public utilities, such as water, gas, electric, street railway, or telephone companies, have followed its example; and, indeed, it is doubtful if such a program would be permitted them even if traffic conditions made it desirable. Although it will appear sufficiently clear that the universalization in use of the local telephone service will require just the treatment the railway has applied, still we can understand why no telephone company has discriminated in its charges in favor of the poorer, potential subscribers as the railways have done in favor of the poorer paying articles of commerce. It is the object of this chapter to show that such a policy is actually necessary and that it is also fundamentally ethical and economically sound.

Ethics of rate making: It is only necessary, I submit, to clearly apprehend the relations of the subscriber to his phone and to other subscribers to make proof of the above assertion.

Let us see what are the uses of a phone:

First. To save A a walk to B's office.

Second. To save B a walk to A's office.

Thus my phone is intended, or its functions, as much for Jones as for me. From this it follows that having supplied myself with a phone, society is obligated to supply the conditions whereby Jones can similarly provide himself. That is, my material interests in the case of the phone, as in the case of the road, entitles me to have a phone connection with Jones's house. The analogy with the public-road system is obvious, and my right to a means of ingress to his premises, now secured by general taxation, would seem to be the same in one case as in the other.

Let us suppose, now, that the system cost of maintaining each telephone is $15 per annum, of which $6 is the expense of making connections and $9 the charge for depreciation and interest. Let us suppose that A earns $2 per day, or $0.20 an hour, which would enable him, impelled by its convenience, to subscribe for a phone, if he could rent it at not more than $6 per annum. On the other hand, let it be supposed that B earns $8 per day, or $0.80 an hour, four times the wages of A, and impelled like A, would subscribe at a rate of $24 per annum. In that case the joint subscriptions of A and B would equal $30, or $15 per phone, the gross sum required. In order that A may reach B and that B may reach A, why should not the tariffs be formed on the theory that would make them both subscribers? Would not this be making a like use with the railways of a principle just as applicable to a similar state of facts in local communication by wire?

It may be answered that such a proposal amounts to a gross discrimination between A and B, and that while the railway tariffs do discriminate between the different classes they do not discriminate between persons, but merely between inanimate commodities. But is there, in fact, any discrimination in either case? Is it not the fact that the railway, theoretically at least, is simply charging each class for service according to the value of such service to the commodity as the only practical mode of fully performing the function of transportation? Let us now recur to the assumed conditions of the illustration for A and B and their telephones. B receives four times the wages of A, therefore his time has four times the monetary value of A's time. In saving the time of the walk for A the agency renders him, accordingly, only one-fourth of the benefit it renders to B. Obviously the tariffs assumed in the hypothesis express the relative utility of the service rendered to each.

Now, if A may be taken to represent the phoneless homes and offices of the country to which the present nondistinguishing tariffs deny this great service, B may be taken to represent the body of relatively well-to-do subscribers, about one-sixth of the population, who are equally denied access to such phoneless population representing the immense body of the people. The five-sixths who are phoneless suffer a great inconvenience from inability to communicate with each other or the more fortunate one-sixth, but it is not improbable that the B class suffer even more from their greater need of communicating with the more numerous body of society.

It is a condition, therefore, rather than a theory that confronts us. If the present class of subscribers had the number of accessible persons multiplied by 6, could they complain if the tariffs should be based on assignments of the cost of service proportioned only to the value of service rendered to the subscriber, especially if such tariff making were found to be the only means, the actual sine quo non, of securing for them the required connections or accessibility to society?

Some such method ultimately must be applied to secure the maximum of social service in the local exchange. Society has resorted to much more aggressive measures in the case of the public road and the common schools. To maintain these agencies it levies its tax without regard to the utility directly resulting to the individual taxpayer. He may be a sailor or a bachelor, yet civilized mankind adopts but one policy—it is general taxation to secure the maximum result, otherwise unattainable.

Evolution of tariffs: In the beginning the phone was treated as the unit of service, and the monthly or annual rates were identical, whether for residence or business uses. No difference of charge was made even for business houses where the calls might be 30,000 a year as against one-tenth that number in some quiet office or even less in the residence. The next step was to charge a higher tariff for business than for residence uses, and this classification still largely obtains in the smaller towns where the limited number of subscribers prevents serious overuse and financial loss. In the larger cities the differentiation of the tariffs has proceeded forward to what is called the measured-service rate.

There is added as an appendix a table giving the local rates for a number of countries as perhaps the best means of studying the varieties of local rate growth throughout the world.

While I believe both the economics and the ethics of the subject would justify the use of discriminating rates based on the value of the service to the user, if such rates proved necessary to exploit the potential traffic, yet it is not thought necessary that they should assume such a form at any time, even if judged necessary. The grades of service from one-party exclusive lines to two, three, or four party lines with graduated rates could be made effectually to cover up the merely apparent discriminations. The base rates could be made sufficiently low for the multiple party lines and sufficiently high for the exclusive to achieve both revenue and traffic producing qualities, with the rate per call alike for all. If eventually, as it is believed the event will show, the cent rate proved adequate alone, the base rate could be commuted into so many calls—for example, base rate, $10, giving 1,000 free calls. Devices for collecting the call rates and for registering their number are cheap and have reached the practical stage. Ultimately the base rate itself might be susceptible of elimination, except temporarily as security against loss in improvident new installations of the phone, where it might be retained as a guaranty of the necessary utilization. The rate evolution here described might bring us ultimately to the "pay as you use" phone, with a low and uniform rate per call for the entire country.

Local rates: It would be highly desirable, if financially feasible, to secure for the phone user a local rate of a cent per call, the average statistical receipts per call for postal-telephone countries, and approximately the average receipt with the independents. Such a rate would, if uniformly available, place the phone service within the reach of every American home. No one should complain of such a rate, as with our wage levels the 1 cent is an actually negligible price. Thus, if such a rate can be finally rendered compensatory, the local phone charge will be completely halved and universal satisfaction with the tariff secured. The letter rate, and if not in a few instances the postal-card rate assuredly, represents that desideratum at present.

The closest tariff approaches to the cent-a-call rate are the German and Swiss tariffs for measured service with a cent-a-call charge. But the Germans have a basal fee besides, and the Swiss also a basal arbitrary charge amounting, after the second year, to $7.72 per annum. Serious apprehension of inability to attain the cent rate as an average statistical result need not be felt in view of the experience of the American independents and foreign postal systems. But grave doubt may be felt as to applying such a rate to the metropolitan populations. It will be argued that while more than compensatory in the towns and villages, on the average, as it has been shown to be, yet in a city like New York such a rate would be ridiculous, especially when compared with existing New York charges. This is an extreme case, it is true, but let us see how the facts stand with respect to New York and the rest of the country.

The Bell reports give the average cost per phone for its entire system, excluding the cost of toll lines, as $111 each. The total book cost of construction of the New York Telephone Co. is given in the report of the public utilities commission as follows:

Number of phones	546, 136
Book value, less toll lines	$62, 612, 107
Investment per phone (Note 16)	$115

Thus the cost per phone is but 3 per cent greater than the average. The assumption that a metropolitan plant exceeds the town and rural so greatly in cost does not seem to be borne out. When millions of miles of wire can be massed in a single conduit, even though at an underground expense, the cost per mile and the maintenance service are greatly reduced.

It may be justly said, in answer, that while the investment per phone does not seriously enlarge for the great cities, the exchange operating expenses do, since a large percentage of the calls (70 per cent in New York) have to be trunked—i. e., the services of a second operator becomes necessary—and the service costs for exchange operators, about 15 per cent of total telephone income, may be added to by 50 per cent for this peculiar metropolitan condition. This is approximately true where the manual telephone system is retained. (Note 18.)

But no discussion of local rates is actually valid that does not explain the use being made in many American cities and other countries—Munich, and so forth—of the automatic system with which the subscriber quickly and simply makes his own connection, eliminating the exchange operator, and by switching and trunking devices reducing the miles of manual wire per phone in the most substantial way. There is now but one phone to 11 persons, and these phones are in the stores and offices, probably not more than one home in five being so provided, especially in the larger cities. Each city block of fifty or a hundred homes has a few subscribers, whose lines, in connection with the automatic system and its switching and trunking devices, could be used as trunks to the central for the multitude of block party lines that would follow the introduction of the postal cent-a-call rate. The total investment per subscriber might thus be brought down to $70 or lower, while the expenses of operation in the cities would be reduced by the amount of the expense of exchange operators. One should feel rather hesitant to make the above statement if the actual facts of practice and accomplishment were not before him. In the case of these local rates so various and incongruous even within the Bell network, it is submitted that while a goal should obtain toward which the postal department would direct its aim, yet the approaches to an ultimate uniform rate for local services should for a time be experimental and only tentative in spirit. The widest latitude should be given the department to conduct its experimentation, and specific freedom to try out its plans in selected places.

If it be found that metropolitan centers represent a greater capital cost per phone, I think it will also be found that such phones represent an even greater potential traffic. On a measured service basis with postal rates, it is only rational to expect a larger number of calls and therefore a larger revenue per phone from city subscribers. The average utilization of the subscriber's phone is said to be less than 2 per cent of its time capacity. We all feel at liberty to write as many letters as we wish, but the visitor to New York who is asked first to pay the telephone company as much as the street car fare would be and then the hotel as much more, if his means are limited, is likely to count the cost.

TENTATIVE RATES.

For all practical purposes the cost of conducting the agency will be nearly the same whether the lines be used at their maximum or their minimum capacity. The problem of the rate maker is therefore twofold:

(a) The body of rates must on the average pay the total cost of service.

(b) The particular rate or adaptations of the rate should produce the maximum utilization of the agency and thus the greatest service to the public.

Therefore, according to the hypothesis, if the gross annual cost of operation were known and the amount of traffic which a given rate graduation would result in might be predicated, it would be feasible, theoretically, to adjust the rates to gratify both maxims. So much for the theory, which, of course, is not precisely realizable, although the universality of postal operations renders theoretical reasoning highly useful and almost accurate, as applied to average periods. What in practice is feasible is a system of approximations as to cost and traffic; and it is by these methods that private financiers pass upon such projects in the establishment of public utilities of the various kinds. Applying this method to our subject, let us observe the probabilities.

COST OF MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION.

INTERURBAN NETWORK.

The operation of 220,928 miles of pole line of Western Union in 1912 represented expenditures as follows:

Operating expenses, including rent of leased lines, reconstruction, repairs, miscellaneous interest, etc	$35, 350, 422
Taxes	713, 413
Total	36, 063, 835

This represents the operating and maintenance expenses of a pole-line network identical in mileage with the toll and long-distance network, including depreciation on 1,500,000 miles of wire, as against about 3,000,000 miles of such telephone wire. It also represents the wastes of telegraphic accounting previously set forth, as well as other elements of expense indicated as susceptible of elimination under postal operation, e. g., office rents, legal expenses, corporate salaries, and so forth. If we ignore these savings and add to the total sum interest at the rate of 3 per cent on 200,000,000 of Government bonds and 4 per cent to cover the depreciation not fully included in the expenditures statement of the Western Union, and also add 5 cents per telegram and 2½ cents per call for the extra business to follow the proposed reduction in rates, then the table following approximately represents an annual fiscal statement for the telegraphic and long-distance telephone services under the new system.

Expense of operation and maintenance of 221,000 miles of pole line and 3,000,000 miles of interurban network	$36,000,000
Additional for depreciation, 4 per cent	8,000,000
Interest on bonds, 3 per cent	6,000,000
600,000,000 telephone connections, at 2½ cents each	15,000,000
300,000,000 extra telegrams, at 5 cents each	15,000,000
Total	80,000,000

The application of continental rates to this traffic has produced a result of over five long-distance calls per capita per annum in Germany, and our phones double theirs in per capita distribution. With reference to the number of telegrams, the New Zealand experience, now nine per capita, is presented. From all these data it is assumed that under postal rates the long-distance phone traffic would equal the German and half equal, at least, the New Zealand development for the telegram. Such results in tabulated form would be as follows:

Average receipt, 300,000,000 telegrams, at 25 cents each	$75,000,000
Average receipt, 600,000,000 conversations, at 10 cents each	60,000,000
Total	135,000,000
Deduct estimated expenditures	80,000,000
Profit	55,000,000

Obviously the figures as to the prospective traffic can only be speculative; but they are no more so than the conditions and computations of private enterprises in the same field.

That the substitution of low-service rates for high ones will find a complementary potential traffic inhibited by the higher rates has been made sufficiently evident. Yet it seems justifiable to add that the experience of the parcel post in giving mobility to an immobile but potential express traffic sustains the thesis.

TELEGRAPH RATES.

Mr. Chairman, the present telegraph tariffs, beginning with a minimum of 25 cents for 10 words, are graduated for increasing distances in multiples of 5 cents up to 50, whence the rate is 60, 75 cents, and $1. The additional word rates correspondingly rise from 2 cents to 3, 4, 5, and 7 cents, respectively. These rates yield now an average on the message of 48 cents. Special rates are given the press on individual messages as set forth in an appendix; while the great body of the news is handled by the press associations over leased wires, for which the telegraph company is commonly paid $20 per mile per annum, the association supplying its own operators. The data are insufficient to permit an opinion as to the merit of this lease rate, but since it is a wholesale rate it is not so likely to be excessive as the individual message rates.

We have seen that, differing from our postage rates, which are quite as low, the telegraph rate here averages about twice on the shorter, and on the longer distances from three to four times as high as in other countries.

Thus, in Germany the rate is 12 cents and 1 cent, with possible distances of 700 miles. In the United States the rate for a like distance would average 50 cents. There are a few foreign rates lower than the German, but it represents a mean for postal-telegraph countries, including New Zealand, with its American wage levels. It is not believed that a flat rate for all distances in a country so large as the United States could be made compensatory without making it too high for the shorter—as it is in Russia—and too low for the extreme distances of which our country abounds. Tentatively, it is proposed to adopt the 12-cent minimum, plus a cent per additional word, which is typical for postal systems, the 12 cents to embrace but 12 words, counting address and signature. This rate, it is proposed, shall be effective for 200 miles. For greater distances a rate scale based on the declension of freight rates for increasing distances is suggested. Broadly regarded, the railway class rates double as the distance quadruples; or, stated in mathematical terms, the rate increases in proportion to the increase of the square root of the mileage of the journey. This law is a recognition of the fact that the terminal service does not increase with the lengthening haul, a fact which would seem to be of even greater importance for increasing telegraph and telephone message journeys. Applying this law to the telegraph message, we should have a result as follows:

Twelve cents, up to 200 miles.

Twenty-four cents, up to 800 miles.

Forty-eight cents, up to 3,200 miles.

But the above table, which is merely expository, contains only three jumps from coast to coast, while the telegraph companies have found it prudent to have not less than eight, from their 25-cent to their $1 charge, for the most part representing increases of 5 cents per advance. The scale following is therefore presented as supplying the necessary gradations.

Cents.	Miles.	Additional word.
		Cents.
12	200	1
30	1,400	1
36	2,000	2

[1] The Australian rate is 24 cents, and 1 cent, for any distance, with an area as large as our own.

It is thought that the day and night letter services adapted to the above rates should be retained, in order that the wires be utilized during otherwise idle hours of the day and night, and to these should be added a new species of telegram, auxiliary to the long-distance conversation. I call it the phone-appointment telegram, say, at a flat cent-a-word rate, to be used by parties in fixing a definite moment for long-distance talks. Much time and annoyance, it would seem, might be saved thus to the parties themselves as well as otherwise wasted plant and personnel in the preliminaries of the attempt to connect long-distance parties.

The above tariffs would average a little less than one-half of the present telegraphic rates, and it is thought would produce an average receipt of 25 cents, somewhat exceeding the average 21-cent receipt for Denmark on a flat 13-cent minimum and 1½-cent additional word rate. Such rates, when taken in connection with the extension of the service to all the post offices, homes, and offices reached by the telephone wires, could hardly fail, ultimately, to render effective the maximum of business and social demand for this form of correspondence. Surely such a development is due us. The people of the United States exceed all others in the number of letters per capita on identical postal rates. It is humiliating to think that we must occupy but the eleventh place among the nations in the degree of use made of the wonderful telegraph agency. Great Britain, Switzerland, France, Norway, and Belgium, all with lower wage levels than ours, precede us in this respect, while New Zealand, with wage conditions like our own, manages to extend its average citizen eight times the telegraph service we get here. And this has been done for a generation. Surely the country has paid enough for its tory statesmen and monopolistic financiers.

The toll telephone rate: It has been said that the telegraphs have word-miles for sale, and that the limit of their capacity might only be reached when the best word-sending devices were fully occupied in transmitting words over every mile of their wire. It is equally true that the telephone agency has mile-minutes to sell, and that its theoretical limit is only reached when every wire is conveying a conversation every moment during the year. Such is the theory. In fact, during sleeping hours, say from 12 to 6 a. m., there can be but a very reduced demand. The conversation unit is 3 minutes in all countries, and according to the reports of the Bell Co. the time consumed in making the connection and the conversation runs from 5 to 7 minutes. Taking the average as 6 minutes, if a circuit were, theoretically, in constant use throughout the year, 87,500 conversations might take place. The German toll and long-distance network consists of 19,623 circuits, while the Bell Co.'s network, reaching about the same number of people, appears to be 33,164. The number of conversations per circuit in Germany was 16.417 in 1910, while on the American system the average was but 7.164. It is pertinent to remark, however, that the average charge in Germany was less than 4 (0.036) cents, while in the United States it was 21 cents. The German rates were effective to induce traffic equal to one conversation to each 31 minutes, or 19 per cent of the theoretically available phone time; while the American rates produced one conversation to each 73 minutes, or a utilization of about 8 per cent of such time. The low utilization in the United States is indubitably the result of her higher rates—over five times those of Germany. This low utilization is made a matter of observation, if not of complaint, in the reports of the American system.

Unlike the telegraphic agency, where the press and the night letter largely preserve the nighttime from waste, while the day letter may use the idle moments of the day, little has been done in the United States to distribute the distance telephone traffic equally throughout even the day hours. In Germany considerable effort has been made to effect such a distribution. There are rates for urgency or immediate demand service, rates for regular subscribers at given hours, regular day and regular night rates, and monthly contract rates.

Under the operation of postal motives it would be interesting to sketch the possibilities of the use which might be made of the waste hours from 12 p. m. to 6 a. m. A purely fanciful case is presented for illustration. The mother lives in New York and her daughter in Chicago. The scale rate is now $6 for a 3-minute talk, and this talk, purely domestic, never takes place between poor people. But the wires are idle, and in Germany the rate would be but 48 cents. Why not permit the use of the lines during midnight hours at that rate for such purpose? The postal rate maker would say, like the railway rate maker, "Well, if it be not diverting higher-priced traffic from the day business, anything I get beyond the cost of exchange operator will be velvet to me, and I will open the wires to this social traffic at the German rates." "Nonsense," objects the private financier, "such a rate is absurd."

Well, let us see as to that. In another part it is shown that the total cost of maintaining and operating the interurban telephonic network for telegraphic and telephonic uses would be about $80,000,000. If half of this represented the telephonic share, the cost per mile of wire, exchange service included, would be at the rate of $13,333 per 1,000 miles. The New York to Chicago wire measures about 1,000 miles, and with return wire 2,000 miles; thus the half annual cost of maintenance and operation would be $26,666, or about 30 cents per six-minute period, counting every moment of the year. These figures are not to be taken as accurate, or even approximate, and yet it is asserted that the true figure, when secured, will not differ enough to impair the case.

The truth is that the German rate, while not seductive to him, might well be introduced during these midnight hours, if the private financier did not fear the effect in two directions. It would call attention to the abnormal day rate, some ten times as high, and might divert a serious proportion of the high-priced day traffic to the cheaper service. Perhaps it might have been wiser for the gentlemen controlling these really postal agencies to have taken the public into their confidence and formulated rates designed to secure the maximum utilization of their plants, even if their rates at first appeared utterly incongruous. But they are not sure that it would be wise. Nor, indeed, can it be very certain that their fears are groundless, considering the state of ignorance and indifference which has permitted the agencies to fall into private hands at all. Their patriotic night rates might indeed be made the false basis of a demand for irrational day rates. And yet this has not been the experience of the railways, with their wisely discriminatory class and commodity rates.

The basis for a long-distance rate, it is believed, would include (1) the total number of messages likely to be transmitted on a given rate—the experience of other countries would afford approximate means of computing them; (2) the total cost of service divided into units of mile-minutes; (3) the graduation of rates for the different hours of the day and night to correspond with the relative desirability as determined by traffic demands; (4) the distribution of wasted or unused plant values into special hour rates in a way the least deterrent to the demand for the service. Doubtless it would require considerable experimentation by the Postal Department to acquire data for the use of these bases, but the Postal System would have a motive to experiment, and it could rely on the support of the public in its efforts. It is highly probable that the result would be a very great salvage of telephonic plant life now lost, to be devoted to public services, which the present rates preclude.

Expository toll rates: With the object rather of stating the conditions of the problems connected with the long-distance rates, I am presenting a tentative tariff for the different distances up to 1,000 miles. Two administrative purposes are sought to be realized, the utilization of the blank period between 12 m. and 6 a. m., and the comparatively blank period from 6 to 9 a. m., as also from 8 p. m. to 12 m., in the telephonic plant day of 24 hours. Conversely, it is sought to cut down the traffic peaks one-half between the hours of 9 a. m. and 12 m. and 6 p. m. and 8 p. m.

It is obvious that if the blanks could be partly filled by new traffic such business would represent nearly all gain to the Postal Department. It is equally obvious, of course, that if future increases of traffic during peak periods could be diverted to the comparatively blank periods by sufficiently attractive rates, a business from three to four times that now done could be accomplished on the present capacity of the wires. Theoretically the rates should rise with the degree of the demand and fall with it in order to scatter or distribute the traffic as nearly equally over the 24 hours as possible, and thus secure the maximum effective capacity of the plant. With a view to illustrate rather than to propose methods for this purpose the following tariff is presented:

Long-distance traffic distributing tariff (3-minute units).

[1] Add cost of appointment telegram, 1 cent a word. Sunday, half week-day rates from 6 a. m. to 12 m. Overtime, one-sixth of given rate per additional minute.

The busy-hour rates could be very much further reduced in the event that the schedule proved effective in more equally distributing the traffic. It is for this purpose that the urgency rates are made so high; for the five busy hours they are as high as at present. Doubtless there is a body of demand that cares not for the highness of the rate—most of the present patronage, perhaps—if it can secure quick and instantaneous service. This character of service is called "urgent" in Germany, and pays three times the regular rate for its preference over the regular traffic.

The rates outlined are of seven varieties. The midnight rate for social objects slightly exceeding the German day rate; the 6-to-9 morning rate and the 8-to-12 night rate, designed to attract traffic from peak periods; the 9 a. m. to 12 m. and the 6 to 8 p. m., or peak periods, with the rates purposely left high to divert excess demands at those hours to other periods; the urgent or quick-service rates; the Sunday rates for social uses; and the one-half or one-sixth per minute additional rate, for overtime, which corresponds to the first three-minute rate since the additional allowance of three minutes for making the connection is included in the first charge.

It will require some years of experimentation to determine just what graduation of rates to busy and nonbusy periods of the day and night will secure the highest attainable utilization of the plant; and the consummation of the lowest rates must await, and is dependent on, such a degree of utilization. Meanwhile the present rates, under the above schedule, run from but one-fifth to two-thirds of the existing rates, with it is believed a substantial enlargement of plant capacity during peak demands. Even if our long-distance traffic carries a rate four times normal, and the public service is at perhaps but one-fourth of its potential, yet normal, though compensatory, rates would not be practicable if the effect was only to exaggerate the peaks and thus perhaps require immediate additions to the plant, although its average utilization, as shown, might be but a paltry 8 per cent of its total capacity. Time and experiment only will qualify the rate maker to formulate the most desirable rate structure.

COMPARISON OF PROBABLE RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Mr. Speaker, it may be of interest to ascertain how the account would have stood, say, for 1912, had the telephones been under postal management, with the telegraph function added. Taking the receipts and expenditures of the telephones for that year and adding also the receipts and expenditures which the superimposing of the telegraph traffic of the telephone network would have involved, we should have the following statement:

Receipts, 1912.

Telegrams (300,000,000)	$75,000,000
Telephone receipts (2)	243,327,611
Total receipts	318,427,611

Expenditures: (2)
Telegrams, 7 cents each	$21,000,000
Telephone, operation and maintenance	28,444,000
Salaries and wages	96,040,541
Rents, real estate	2,280,545
Rentals of conduits, etc	1,206,015
Miscellaneous	402,784
Taxes	12,411,516
Depreciation charges	40,755,657
Interest, 3 per cent, on Government bonds	30,000,000
Total expenditures	232,541,058
Résumé:
Total receipts	318,427,611
Expenses, interest, and depreciation	232,541,058
Net balance	85,886,553

The above table substantially reflects what the postal budget for 1912 would have been had it conducted the telephone and telegraph services over the telephone network upon the existing telephone rates, supplemented by the telegraph rates proposed. It is plain enough that the department will be on safe financial ground, with a surplus of over a fourth of its receipts to apply to the extension of the service to the farmside and the homes of the masses.

Against this alluring balance it will be urged that the statement takes no account of the higher wages which the Postal System would have paid. Granted; its scale would have been higher. But as a future factor it is submitted, as the judgment of the telephone engineers, that the reduction of the personnel concomitant with the certain introduction of the automatic phone much more than meets the difference between private and postal wages.

SUMMARY OF BENEFITS.

Let us see what our reasoning supports as the advantages to be ultimately derived from a postalization of the telephonic network.

(a) A cent-a-word telegram.

(b) Long-distance rates from one-half to one-fourth those prevailing.

(c) A cent a call, local conversation.

(d) Universal use of the telephone.

Only item (d) presents an achievement not already attained in other countries; i. e., the phone in every man's house. But with item (c) within reach our American wage levels offer the highest assurance that a service so cheap and necessary will become as universal as the letter service.

That we can be confident as to the economic feasibility of the above service program is indicated by our present postal achievements.

They are:

(a) The 1 and 2 cent letter rates, good to all our possessions, to Canada, Great Britain, and Germany, and to the farms of the country.

(b) The cent-a-pound, or 2 (2.38) mills per mail piece, for educational publications consisting of the magazine, the periodical, and newspaper of the country.

(c) The parcel post, extending to the farm with rates as low as 5 cents, against the 25 cents hitherto charged by the privately financiered express service.

Besides these, it dispatches money and pays interest on deposits, insured by the indubitable security of the Nation, and performs other services. All these services it renders as cheaply as any other postal system, stated in terms of money (except Japan), and in terms of price levels performs them, along with Canada, for the lowest payments in the world. These are some of the advantages of public or postal financiering. And we ask no consideration in this comparison for the higher wages of the postal employee of the United States or of the higher price levels here, nor for the fact that railway mail transportation is paid for here, which is commonly not the case elsewhere.

Of the great advantage which should flow to society in the way of relieving the local governing institutions from the strain to which they have been subjected by the corrupting influences of franchise hunters, it seems unnecessary to do more than refer to the experience of San Francisco recited more fully in the chapter on social effects. The New York (Bell) Telephone Co. recently put forward a claim of $30,000,000 as representing the value of the franchise it obtained from the city government to lay its wires in the streets. If private capital is to be relied on, then such franchises must continue, and if conceded any value it is apparent that bribery and corruption, whether frequently exposed and punished or not, are likely to continue; and with such stupendous amounts involved ordinary virtue in the promoter and official can only be expected to give way. On both economic and social grounds the verdict of the nations has been "postalize"; and possessing an institution as trustworthy and efficient as our postal agency there is nothing to discourage the expectation of even higher accomplishments here.

OBJECTIONS.

I distinguish the difficulties which attach to any constructive program from objections which take the character of fundamental defects in the proposal itself; such difficulties, for example, as the inconvenience of financing the project, the adjustments and readjustments necessary to secure the desirable properties in the rates, the extensions of the network to meet additional demands, the addition to the Postal Service of the numerous personnel essential to the conduct of correspondence by wire, and, finally, the effect of competition by the postal telegraph on the telegraph lines in private hands, all of which may be difficulties and yet not objections. It is meant to meet these in an absolutely frank way, and so I shall take them up in their order:

Financing the acquisition: It is assumed that the acquisition of the total telephone network, embracing local exchanges, toll and long-distance lines, would cost about ten hundred millions of dollars. The purchase would, of course, be financed by the issue of Government bonds. The question presented is, therefore, whether the marketing of this amount of bonds would be so difficult as to render the proposition undesirable.

Great financing enterprises during recent years have been as follows:

The Panama Canal.
The United States Steel Co.
Acquisition of the railways by Japan.
Acquisition of the railways by Switzerland.
Acquisition of one-third of the railways by France.
Acquisition of the national telephone network of Great Britain.

The plan would not involve the compensation of the owners in one gross payment or at one time. While it would, of course, be necessary to acquire title and possession of the networks by a single process of statutory appropriation, and on the same day, it by no means follows that payment for the properties would or could be invoked in the same total or single way. There are, altogether, some 3,000 companies or distinct legal proprietorships of the network, and even the Bell associated companies number more than 200. There would, therefore, be as many distinct payments as there are different proprietorships. Moreover, these payments would naturally extend over a period of time sufficiently long to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to make its appraisals and the courts to adjust such legal questions as to valuation as may arise. It is thus apparent that the payments would be distributed throughout a period of several years and be decentralized into as many acts of payment as there are distinct legal owners. The extension by such postal acquisition of the securities of the superseded companies would be likely to create an equal demand for substitute securities and render it but natural that most of such bond issues would be accepted by the former owners in lieu of their displacing private holdings. Thus ample time and opportunity to market the bonds necessary would seem to be assured, and it is not likely that the program would present any difficulties not successfully encountered in financing the Panama Canal.

Extensions of network: This represents a difficulty under any kind of proprietorship, but more especially does it represent a fundamentad deficiency under private financiering. We have seen that the normal action of the private motive will be to extend the network only to those points promising sufficiently attractive profits. This motive has under our conditions substantially worked out its potency, except for the normal increase from year to year. Nearly every office and store and the residences of the well to do in the cities have been reached, and with these achievements the private financier has attained his practical limitation. The homes of the masses he has no motive to reach by the only means competent to reach them, namely, lower rates devoid of the desirable margin of profit.

As a high-priced haberdasher he naturally prefers the patronage of the gentry, and, as boldly proclaimed by the Bell system, meets demands of the masses with the assertion that "Instantaneous transmission of communications is as yet a convenience of luxury; it is not a necessity, and is still confined to the comparatively few, and for that reason should be at the cost of the few that find benefit and profit in that use."

The experience of the Bell system is that 48 per cent of their phones are "business." Whether this includes hotel-room phones does not appear. If half only of the phones are in the residences, we should have about 4,000,000 out of 20,000,000 homes supplied with phones, or one in five, embracing the 20 per cent of the population that is rich enough to patronize this alleged "luxury." It is not fair to expect that extensions to the other 80 per cent will be made by merely profit-seeking capital.

In the legislation proposed all existing agencies for extension and new development, together with important additional ones, are put in service. That is to say, individuals, associations, and corporations, together with the Postal Department, the municipalities, counties, and States, may engage in the work of extension of the system under license from the Postmaster General. They may operate them themselves, or have them postally operated, but the right to postalize the ownership is reserved upon paying a price for the extensions which shall not be so low as to discourage nonpostal construction. The above methods have been successfully employed by the Austrian Government to assure freedom and adequacy of railway development under a régime of State ownership and management, and there is every probability that these methods would prove effective to secure the maximum of telephonic extension in the United States.

Rate adjustments: It is of the highest importance that there should exist complete flexibility in the rate structure. Private financiering until the recent era of regulation possessed this advantage for use as its motive might impel. There is a disposition to associate postal rates with the inertia of Congress and the inflexibility of our statutes. This objection is a fundamental one, but it is provisional none the less. If Congress undertook to make the rates, as it does the rates of postage, and gave no administrative power to the Postal Department to revise such rates, as it did in the case of the parcel post, then I should consider this objection to be a serious one indeed. But Congress has already shown that it can distinguish between what is a legislative and what is an administrative function. It has not undertaken to make freight rates or express rates, and recently delegated to the Postmaster General the power to revise the parcel-post rates and weight limit. The rate-making function is treated as administrative elsewhere and, moreover, the legislation proposed does not undertake to formulate the rates at all, but vests that duty with the postal administration under the restriction that the rates shall be revised from time to time in order to make them compensatory and to promote the public service.

The personnel: In the 1912 census the total number of employees is given as 183,361. This compares with approximately 300,000 employees in the Postal Service, who, to an extent, would replace the telephone personnel. More than half of the telephone employees—96,322—were exchange operators, and of these 94,360 were girls and women. Improvements in telephone practice, the automatic switchboard now being installed abroad and in prospect, involve the elimination of nearly all exchange operators, so that the future telephone personnel need not exceed relatively one-half the present number. Two difficulties will be urged as involved in acquiring this personnel. First, probable postal hesitancy to eliminate the employee as mechanical improvement renders him unnecessary. This difficulty will happily take care of itself. The exchange operators are girls, and experience, as reported in a study of the Bureau of Labor, shows that the average time of their employment is less than three years, when their service is terminated by marriage. This is also the experience in Great Britain, I am informed by the British postmaster general. Accordingly, by simply refusing to fill the vacancies, the necessary reduction of the exchange-operator force will accomplish itself within a period sufficiently brief for improvement purposes.

The other difficulty that may be urged is that increases of wages and reduction of hours of service will be asked by the personnel and conceded by the Government. This is probably true. But is it an objection? Would it not, on the whole, be socially desirable that some of the savings of unification and postalization should go to the necessary employees to lift them to the wage and service level of the postal personnel? The rank and file of the latter are admittedly better paid and their working conditions more favorable than employees in nearly similar private employments. But instead of being an objection, this fact may fairly be appealed to as supportive of postalization. The employees should be placed in the protected classified list and their wages and conditions of employment, like the rates, left plastic until, through experience, the Postal Department has developed a complete system of regulations for the service. If it be feared that the efficiency of the employees in work done might not be as great for the future, reference is confidently made to the efficiency tables in former pages, where the Bell performance per employee is compared with the publicly conducted telephones of other countries, and then again to a comparison of our own postal performance with those countries. The student can not be left in doubt as to the verdict, which is highly creditable to the American postal workman.

Telegraph competition: The acquisition of the telephonic network alone, as proposed, would leave the telegraph lines undisturbed in the hands of their present owners. But the postal system would engage in telegraph business over the telephone wires, at least to the extent of transmitting individual messages. This would mean, of course, competition with the telegraph companies. President Vail, of the Western Union, is of the opinion that it need not fear such a situation, and asserts:

> There is not a single instance of telegraph and telephone companies operated by private corporations in competition with Government operation where the private service is not better than the Government, and profitable, against unprofitable Government operation, if untrammeled by Government interference. (Bell report, 1911, p. 40.)

Since Mr. Vail spoke as president alike of the Western Union Telegraph Co. and the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., its major stockholder, this difficulty would seem to be answered for the Western Union, which, having granted none, asks no quarter from the public. The opinion of the Mackay companies as to Government competition is not available, but, even if unfavorable, it is submitted that it is estopped to complain. It went into the field itself with a deliberate purpose of competition, and its activities so far have been merely to duplicate the preoccupying lines of its rival. But this company is even under more distinct duty not to complain of postal rivalry. When, in the eighties, the Government was about to give the public a postal telegraph at reduced rates, it came forward and asked the Government to desist, giving it the formal assurance that it would, as fast as its lines were extended, give the public as low or lower rates.

The result was that the Government forbore at that time to postalize. Instead of keeping its promise this system joined hands with the Western Union to eliminate the popular 10 and 15 cent rates in existence, raising them to 25 cents, and has since maintained an effective agreement with it to keep the telegraph tariffs of the United States the highest in the world. A flagrant violator of its pledge to the public to furnish it the reasonable rates the Government was about taking measures to provide, it surely can not now contend that the people should give heed to any opposition it may make.

Such opposition might take the form of claiming that the telegraphic lines should be immune from competition. That is, in effect, that the telegraph companies refusing to give the public the benefit of competition in rates, the postal agency should not be permitted to do so. Many persons will fail to see any distinction between the competition of the post office and express companies and the like procedure with the telegraph companies. It may be urged by the latter companies that they should be purchased and not be subjected to competition from the Government. There are two circumstances preventing such a course, for one of which—the second—the companies are responsible. First, in posssession of the telephone network the telegraph lines would be only an unnecessary and very expensive adjunct to the Post Office; second, the telegraph lines notoriously are so water-logged by false capitalization that the maxim "caveat emptor" obviously applies itself, and no Government could risk their forcible appropriation. If abandoning Mr. Vail's position that postal competition need not be feared, it be argued that such competition will reduce the value of the properties and that the people should shoulder the loss by buying the properties without needing them, then a question of ethics is presented to be answered by another question of ethics, thus: Should the people, who have suffered from exorbitant telegraph rates for generations, now also be made to unpocket besides the amount of capitalization of the declining telegraph institution merely that their owners, who took the profits with the chances of the enterprise, may escape the results of the progress of mechanical civilization? On what ethical theory can a few thousand stockholders ask that the obsolescent losses of private property shall be shifted from them to the innocent taxpayer of the country?

It does not follow, however, that the gloomy picture of injury to the telegraph companies shall come true. There are several reasons for a more hopeful view. The competition would not extend to the whole field of telegraphic activity. With reference to much of it their rates are not so unsatisfactory. For example:

First. The Associated Press business.

Second. The stock-quotation business.

Third. The patronage of those who do not object to higher rates.

Fourth. Lease of the wires to various business demands.

Fifth. The growing demands of the railways for such wires which are mostly located favorably for railway use.

All of these varieties of business would likely remain to the companies unimpaired, as also their cable traffic. With proper initiative and the elimination of the nonpaying offices, as also the use of devices to economize on their extravagant telegram accounting, it is not apparent why fair returns on the fair value of their property should not follow. At all events, no claim should be made by them for a charitable purchase of their lines until they have exhausted their ability to "make good" under the new conditions. If they succeeded, there would be no problem of charity to deal with. If they failed, we should know in what degree and the exact character of the problem.

The wireless: The startling character of the discoveries and innovations involved in the wireless method of communication may suggest to some the possibility that it may be applied to the domestic, or, rather, land and municipal, correspondence, and thus perhaps diverting the correspondence from the wires, place them on the scrap heap. This phase of the matter has been carefully inquired into, with the result that the Government experts declare such a prospect to be baseless. They explain that the method of the wireless is by the principle of disturbance of the medium—that is, by waves which disturb the ether between the point of sending and the point of receiving the message; indeed, the waves actually extend backward as well as in the direction of the address. This is illustrated by the wavelets caused by the throwing of a stone into a pool, which move equably in all directions.

If many persons were throwing stones in such a pool at the same time, the wavelets would commingle and lose their identity or definition. Just so when the wireless messages are being sent from different stations, attuned alike, a confusion of vibrations results and the messages can not be deciphered because of the "interference" thus caused. It is true that attuning to different wave lengths is possible and, when correctly done, the interference is avoided. But the limits within which this distinguishing of wave lengths can even mathematically be carried is said not to exceed 33 in number; and so the nature of things would prevent more than 33 stations working constantly between two points. Thus, the Government scientists affirm that no development of any now known principle of communication can take the place of the telephone wires where selectiveness and secretiveness are necessary in the message. A wireless message flares itelf to the whole world and correspondingly attuned instruments must listen. Thus, in a city where a half million phones are employed, or even in the smallest exchanges, it is apparent that the nonconducted or unisolated wireless message is out of the question for meeting the requirements of the telephone. For trans or intra oceanic uses where the number of communications is at its lowest, or even in uninhabitable districts like Alaska, with great distances to traverse, the wireless offers an ideal and economical agent, and for such fields its future would seem to be unrivaled. It is a supplement to and not a substitute for existing telephone agencies.

It is important, however, that provisions should be made to meet the contingencies of future discovery and invention in order to devote them to their greatest usefulness for society, and it is for this reason mainly that a monopoly of all electrical forms of communication is reserved in the bill to the Postal Department.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST POSTALIZATION.

Perhaps the arguments against our Postal System discharging the whole function of communications, as is done nearly universally elsewhere, have been best stated by Mr. Vail in his report as president of the Bell system for 1913. Beginning with the assertion that the owners of the property would not suffer, since they would be fully compensated, he makes the objections which I shall now proceed to consider. Should it be self-sustaining? Mr. Vail:

> Should Government operation be self-sustaining in its full significance, entirely maintained and operated out of its own revenue, or should such properties be operated at a charge on general revenue at the cost of the whole public for the benefit of a part? There may be some things which should be made free and convenient for the whole public even at the expense of the public revenues, but the telegraph and telephone are not of them.

The answer to this is, of course, a formal "Yes." The receipts ought at least to balance expenditures. But this has a meaning of more potent significance under the rules of public finance than it possesses with the private financier. For him each exchange must be self-sustaining—unless it is maintained to overcome a rival. He could not rationally be expected to say: "There is a point that needs an exchange; it will not be self-sustaining, but I will maintain it, and pay its losses out of my profit from the other exchanges." He would be a fool to establish any exchange that did not promise a profit. Conversely the postal financier, with a maximum of public service in view, will make the fat agencies replenish the lean; will borrow from the postal profits at metropolitan centers to establish and maintain the star and rural routes, over a million miles in extent. The Bell system has for this reason wholly neglected the countryside, and bars the workman's residence in even the city by its prohibitive rates, while the postal agency is giving us the most extraordinary rural and city carrier service the world now knows.

Before the parcel post eliminated it with a substantial surplus the postal "deficit" was made the excuse for such attacks as were made upon the efficiency of the Postal System.

It may be said, with regard to the postal deficits, they represent only a small part of the amount of social service rendered under statutory public policies for which the public is not directly called upon to pay. The franking privilege (1.85 per cent of the total postal service), the carriage and handling of second-class matter for educational purposes constitutes 29.24 per cent, carried at about one-seventh its proportional cost; these are the items which take the form of a "deficit," only because the department has no "public-service" statement showing the amount and value of service rendered, like a railway does. If such a table were presented there would be no deficit, but a surplus of very many millions, quite as many millions as the telegraphs and telephones show as the profits of their private financiering. This very clearly appears when we charge to the franked matter and the second-class educational mail pieces the rates charged on other postal matter. Thus only 5.19 per cent of postal revenues are derived from the 29.24 per cent of the total postal services devoted to such second-class matter, and no revenues from the 1.85 per cent of such service given to franked and penalty matter.

It can be readily seen, therefore, that 25.90 per cent of the postal service goes unaudited, and that a correct statement of its services would credit its receipts with that additional amount. In that event the department would have shown a surplus at all times since the war, and in 1912 a surplus of more than $60,000,000.

The objection to the postal deficit fails, moreover, to comprehend the distinction between private and public financiering. The test of success in the former is the degree of profit it brings the private investor; in the latter the test is the degree of social service rendered. This argument of a deficit might be as well made—and doubtless would be if the financial motive existed for making it—against the public roads, schools, and colleges, not to say the churches and other eleemosynary institutions which are all expenditures and show no audited fiscal profit. But the challenger has disavowed such standards of the private financier and proposes to justify its tenure of these public monopolies on social service principles. Even so, it can not call that a deficit which simply represents unaudited services to the Nation, performed at its command upon grounds of settled educational public policy. Moreover, these deficits are in another sense chargeable to the influences of the private financier who has succeeded for 40 years in debarring the postal system from the very profitable function of the parcel post. Had this business been in its hands the department would have shown no deficit, but surpluses in much the greater number of years. The initiatory experience of the very limited service we now enjoy shows that even with the most substantial reductions in the rates the service is highly profitable to the department.

I present a statement showing the financial results where the postal institutions are exercising the telephonic and telegraphic functions in connection with the mail.

Financial results, receipts, and expenditures of postal systems in respect to mail, telegraph, and telephone services. (1910) (3).

Country.	Receipts.	Expenses.	Surplus.
Germany	$194,272,463	$171,594,102	$22,678,361
Austria	37,494,963	36,774,693	720,270
Belgium	11,276,039	7,286,550	3,989,489
Denmark	5,151,680	4,052,103	1,099,577
France	69,688,373	60,765,697	8,922,676
Great Britain	130,145,874	107,815,457	22,330,417
Hungary	18,779,415	13,217,728	5,561,687
Italy	22,922,406	17,580,193	5,342,213
Japan	31,881,235	16,557,372	15,326,863
Norway	3,849,538	3,242,909	606,629
Netherlands	7,786,553	7,418,162	368,391
Russia	68,222,406	33,590,294	34,632,112
Sweden	9,684,515	8,116,610	1,567,905
Switzerland	14,169,411	13,673,772	495,639
New Zealand	5,805,750	5,112,762	692,988
Total	631,133,621	506,798,404	124,335,217

Such are the results with the postal establishments completely exercising their normal functions. Who can doubt that our so-called postal deficits represent the deprivation of those profitable functions which the express companies and the wire agencies for 40 years have succeeded in diverting from our Postal System.

FUNCTIONS OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Vail's view of these is as follows:

The functions of government and the causes of its being are "control" and "regulation"—control of the individual and regulation of the community so far as is necessary to secure the enjoyment of life, liberty, and happiness by all, and "control" or "regulation" of anything that might in any way become a menace to the social organization or to its individual members.

To the extent that anything is a necessity in its absolute sense to the enjoyment of life and health—the absence of which would endanger the community as a whole—it is a proper function of the Government either to provide it or to see that it is so provided as to bring it within the reach of every individual member of society, even to provide it for all at the cost of the general revenue.

A sufficient supply of potable water available to all is a necessity. The street car, the electric light, the telephone, or telegraph are conveniences of the highest importance, but are not necessities in the foregoing sense.

Water is a necessity, but so is food, clothing, heat, shelter, and if all these productive agencies were to be taken over by the State it would be almost completely socialized. I do not think "necessity," in the sense Mr. Vail suggests, is the test which conservative people will consider applicable. They will much prefer the rule of the economists, who confine the activities of the State to those "monopolies that are superior to the influences of competition" and in which the social-service motive is necessary to realize the maximum utilization of the plant and working force; and this, as we have seen, becomes almost entirely a question of the lowness of the price at which the product can be sold and depends but little on the kind of necessity characterizing the demand for the product.

THE TELEPHONE ESSENTIALLY A MONOPOLY.

Telephone and telegraph systems operated under common control can avoid duplication by making use of the same wires.

For practicability of management, economy of operation, or efficiency of service there should be one combined telephone and telegraph system. This has been the Bell contention and this is the conclusion reached by the Post Office Committee and by congressional advocates of Government ownership, who say in substance that the telephone and telegraph should constitute one system, and that a monopoly.

Upon this point the agreement is complete. There should be a monopoly. It is only to be decided whether in its operation the postal or the private motive should govern. The private motive makes its rates and builds its extensions in obedience to the right of the investor to seek the highest profit, and this means low utilization per unit of capital engaged. The postal motive makes its rates and extensions with a view to the greatest public service, and this means the maximum of utilization and service to society.

REGULATION.

The Bell system, as against the advocates of social service and popular rates, falls back on "regulation."

Government regulation can effectually curb "monopoly" and "selfish exploitation" and make them useful without destroying them by subordinating them to the public for the public advantage. Government ownership and operation would destroy individual initiative; they would create monopoly and increase and strengthen its evils by placing it in the control of officials and servants responsible only to themselves as a political party and parts of the organization which made or unmade the Chief Executives.

In answer to the "regulation" proposal the following questions are suggested:

First. Could the regulating tribunal order our telegraph rates cut in half?

Second. Could it order the telegraph companies to maintain service at all points where we have post offices?

Of course it is obvious that either order would bankrupt the telegraph companies, whereas as a postal side service both results are within the reach of postal operation.

Third. Would the regulating tribunal order the introduction of rates that would yield only a 3 per cent return to investors?

Fourth. Would it declare "the average toll and long-distance rates elsewhere are less than one-third those of the United States?" They must be reduced in that proportion here.

Fifth. Would it declare "the Independents collect less than a cent a local call for their service on the average; the Bell rates average more than twice as much"? The Bell system must adopt a universal cent-a-call rate.

Certainly no sane regulating tribunal would take any such liberty with another man's property. The implication that popular or postal rates or service will be attained through "regulation" is, if really meant, simply insincere.

"Regulation" will not accomplish the postal objects of universal and cheap communication simply because society has no right to take chances with other people's property. It may take chances with its own. You go to the Postmaster General and say, "Cut your rates in two and your traffic will double and the service to the public will be similarly doubled." This is, in fact, what was said to the Postmaster General as to parcel-post rates (10)—and this is what he did, cutting the rates from 4 to 1 and from 3 to 1 cent a pound on the shorter zones—and the traffic has more than doubled while the profits have not suffered (9). Even a small deficit for experimental purposes would be justified, especially if the rate were elastic and the Postal Department could protect itself by adjustments of the rate. If you start out with the assurance that the service would be doubled and the deficit would be 1 per cent, to ultimately disappear with the development of the traffic, a public-service agency like the post office would be more than justified, because in that instance it is losing 1 per cent in one pocket but it is making 100 per cent in the other pocket—the people and the Postal System being identical terms.

The naturally different disposition of the private functionary in such a situation was illustrated by the action of the Bell system with the Chicago & Milwaukee Telegraph Co. case, where it raised the telegraph rate from 15 to 25 cents when it secured control, and thereby reduced the telegraphic traffic by nearly one-half.

Of this experience Mr. Vail remarks:

The Chicago & Milwaukee Telegraph has been set up as an example of the evils of private operation. Why this single line of some 50 miles in length should have been selected is difficult to understand. Any line situated under such favorable conditions, doing business only between two large cities, should and could be operated at rates which could not apply to lines or systems which take business from and to all points, while the peculiar conditions under which this particular line operated put it absolutely outside of comparison, whether with other lines or with any system. The history of this company is well known, and if not known to those who have used it as an illustration, it could have been obtained with little effort.

Built in 1878 by some linemen as a speculation, it was sold to some members of the boards of trade of Chicago and Milwaukee and incorporated with a stock of $50,000. The business of this line was confined almost exclusively to messages from floor to floor of the two boards, to news service, and to leasing private lines. While it accepted other service, it had no organization to and did not deliver or collect messages except by telephone. The company apparently made large profits, but it must have been at the expense of maintenance and depreciation, for later on the company was reorganized, with a capital stock of $50,000 and $50,000 of bonds, and the lines reconstructed. This new company operated until 1905, when it went into receivership, and the lines were operated by the receiver until 1907, when it was offered for sale, and the Chicago and the Wisconsin telephone companies, needing additional lines, purchased it in connection with the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. for toll and long-distance telephone business. This was five years before an interest in the Western Union was acquired or contemplated.

The lines are now used for telephone business principally.

We learn from the above that the line doubled its functions at the same time it nearly doubled its telegraphic rate. It went into use as a telephone line as well as a telegraph line, and secured two sources of income instead of one. This would mean that its expenses of upkeep and maintenance would be divisible between both functions. And yet the telegraph rate was raised 60 per cent. Just so. It is what any private individual would do—seek as much profit from his property as he could. But it seems pertinent here to ask, Where was the regulator? What patron had enough interest in his 15-cent rate to pay the expenses of calling upon the regulator? And if he had called upon him, what would have likely resulted?

In a larger sense the whole theory of regulation, when extended beyond the point of eliminating competition and discriminations, seems to have broken down, especially when applied to the tariffs, even of our railways. We have found that we can not take from the investor his right to determine the rate of interest he shall secure without breaking down his initiative as an investor. The old investment we can subject to any rate of interest the courts will sanction. But in fixing such a rate we have killed the investor's spirit for new enterprises. He will refuse to take the chances of loss where the possibilities of profit are restricted to any percentage which the public may consider rational and moderate. A rate of return, say, 8 per cent, as maintained by the Bell system, even for a property national in scope, is likely as low as the private financier can work with and induce the flow of new capital. And yet the difference between a telephone rate that had to carry 8 per cent for capital charges and a postal-telephone rate that had to carry but 3 per cent would probably determine the feasibility of reducing the average rates of the Bell system—1.86 cents per local call—to 0.93 cents, the average of the rest of the telephone institutions of the world.

GOVERNMENTAL OPERATION AND EFFICIENCY.

Government administration is more or less a game of politics, and while with Government operation it may sometimes be possible to have efficiency it will always be impossible to have economy.

This is a mere assertion utterly at variance with the facts. The efficiency of our telegraphic agencies, in work done per worker, has been shown to be but 8 telegrams per day as against 10.9 for the worker in New Zealand, although the former had a daily traffic supply of 41 messages per office as against 12 for the latter. And although wages are higher in New Zealand the operative cost of the telegram there is about one-half what it is here. In the matter of the telephone we similarly find the Bell system ranking but ninth in product per employee, while our Postal System in product per employee ranks second at least, and perhaps first, among the nations of the world. In the light of the facts presented under the title of "Efficiency" the quoted declaration can fairly be dismissed.

NEW ZEALAND.

Mr. Vail:

Why New Zealand's experience should be put forth so prominently as a reason for Government operation is difficult to understand. It is a fringe of people on a narrow circumference of the islands. It is a country of recent settlement and many social experiments. It has one-thirtieth the area and one-hundredth the population and a debt already equal to one-third of that of the United States. If the so-called advantages of Government operation are the cause of the debt, the United States wants none of it.

New Zealand has been selected because it is, in price and wage levels particularly, the fairest comparison. If you compare with European rates, the answer of dissimilar and lower wages is at once made. In a comparison of the American wires with those of New Zealand all the conditions—wages, hours of labor, density of population, pole line per 100 inhabitants, supply of traffic per office—are favorable to cheap operation in the United States. The truth is that our telegraph agencies are, economically speaking, a carnival of waste, which only their managerial interests can find a motive to defend. Private initiative—what is it worth when it neglected to add the telephone conversation to the telegraph wire while postal systems were actually doing so?

It is suggested that the public debt of New Zealand is nearly one-third as great as ours. Perhaps; but New Zealand owns her telegraphs, her telephones, and her railroads, and the United States owns nothing.

TELEPHONE DENSITY.

Mr. Vail:

In the United States there are 9.7 stations (telephones) to each 100 population—more than double that of any other country, nearly six times that of Great Britain, over thirteen times that of France, more than four times that of Switzerland. There are nearly 2,500,000 telephones in rural habitations in the United States—nearly one to every two strictly rural habitations.

This is the one fact of real importance presented in the argument for the private financing of this branch of communication. But the same fact is true of the American automobile, and the disproportion is even greater, although the automobile properly enough is under private financing in those countries.

The relative density of our telephones, like the automobiles, is a coincidence of our social wealth. It may never happen that the working classes of Europe can afford a telephone, even at the cent-a-call rate (plus $7.72 annually after second year) universal in Switzerland. But such a rate here would place the telephone within the reach of the home having an income of $700 a year and make the use of the telephone as extensive as the action of the Postal System. This would result from our higher wage levels. And with the introduction of the automatic telephone and the consequent reduction of the investment per telephone and the operative cost a cent-a-call rate, competent authorities assure us, would prove amply compensatory.

THE TOLL AND LONG-DISTANCE RATES.

Of this, Mr. Vail observes:

It is claimed that telephone-toll and long-distance charges of the Bell system are excessive as compared with government-owned plants of Europe. This is not the fact if the service given is considered. The charge for the immediate service, which is the ordinary service given by the Bell system, is higher than for the ordinary service, which is a deferred service, given by those systems, but it is not higher than their charge for immediate service; where immediate service is given, if at all, it is from two to three times that for ordinary.

That the facts may be before us I reproduce the rates:

Long-distance tariffs.

Country.	100 miles.	300 miles.	500 miles.	700 miles.
(a) Sweden	$0.08	(a) $0.13	(a) $0.20	(a) $0.27
(b) France	.10	(k) .24	(k) .36	(k) .48
(c) Italy	.19	(e) .34	(n) .38	(b) .58
(d) Belgium	.19	(b) .35	(b) .53	(g) 1.12
(e) Norway	.20	(n) .38	(m) .81	(l) 1.26
(f) Denmark	.20	(c) .38	(h) .84
(g) Japan	.20	(g) .50	(g) .87
(h) New Zealand	.24	(f) .54	(e) 1.50
(i) Great Britain	.24	(m) .61
(k) Germany	.24	(o) .62
(l) Australia	.32	(h) .72
(m) Austria	.38	(l) .80

(o) Russia	.38

NOTE.—The letters preceding the name of each country are used to identify the countries to which the rates given for 300, 500, and 700 miles belong.

These are ordinary rates quoted for other countries. So is the Bell rate; it is the only rate it has. Some of the other countries have other rates, e. g., the "urgent" (Note 7). If your business will not wait and you must have the communication at once, you may push the "ordinary" patron aside and secure a preferential use of the line by paying.

The same characteristics obtain with the telegram in many instances. The American companies have but one rate, the ordinary, which is twice that elsewhere, and even more for long distances. In other countries a preferential service can be purchased by paying a double rate. But people make no more use of that privilege in those countries than they do here of the privilege of having the telegram repeated back, to assure its accuracy, by the payment of a double rate.

Let it be conceded, for analysis sake, that the American service is, in effect, preferential. With the result, as is stated, that the wires from New York to Chicago are in use less than one-third of the working 10 hours of the day, is there any more occasion that all such service should be "preferential" or "immediate" than that all letters should carry special-delivery stamps? What about the potential traffic that would move at a "take-your-turn" rate of one-third or one-fourth the Bell rates, but which is inhibited by the preferential rates? Is a great public agency of communication justified in confining its service to the merely preferential class; in denying its facilities to the ordinary traffic of our country? Suppose the railways should say, "We shall henceforth run only Pullman cars and the rate shall be three times the rate in the day coach." Our American long-distance telephone institution is copying the methods of the king's haberdasher who does not want the patronage of the $25-a-suit man, but who has a minimum of $50 to drive him away. But there are haberdashers who will serve the common man at his price. Our telephone monopoly excludes him in most cases.

But these postal establishments also carry rates that are lower than the ordinary. Their night rates are as follows: France, from 9 p. m. to 7 a. m., three-fifths, and by monthly contract, two-fifths of day rates; Italy, 9 p. m. to 6 a. m., 20 per cent less, by contract, 40 per cent less on 6-minute, 50 per cent on 12-minute, and 60 per cent on 18-minute calls; Denmark, night, about 50 per cent reduction; New Zealand, night rates, one-half of day rates; Germany, night, monthly subscription, one-half day rates; and Hungary, night, one-half rates for press. My experience and information is that the Bell system is withdrawing its night rates. In view of the highly satisfactory state of its finances, is it not pertinent to inquire why?

Mr. Vail admits the financial feasibility of these cheaper rates:

Even at the higher wages paid in this country, a deferred or waiting telephone service, more satisfactory and more dependable than the foreign service, could be given at rates more or less equal to the foreign rates for such service, notwithstanding that the companies here must pay capital charges, including dividends, all administration expenses, taxes, and other charges.

This admission is almost startling. Why are such rates not given, then?

Mr. Vail replies:

Deferred service is not given because our public demands a better service.

But the Bell system can give them both just as the postal systems do.

Again:

In the Bell system the toll and exchange service is immediate; that is, the customer is given service when he calls for it and not put on a waiting list and made to await his turn. Sufficient operating facilities are provided for all the normal peaks of load. The foreign Government-owned plants used for comparison only provide facilities for the average load. Customers must await their turn, which during certain times of the day means hours, not minutes. Such deferred service, causing an even and continuous load during active hours, more than quadruples the possible service which can be given by operators and plant.

The italics are Mr. Vail's.

Now, we know, if Mr. Vail knows, and he has a full opportunity of knowing, that, despite our high-wage levels, the postal-telephone rates of other countries are feasible here. No one would object to their retaining the present rates for their immediate or urgent service, and that done, certainly no patron should have reason to oppose their giving long-distance rates "more or less equal to the foreign rates for such service."

According to Mr. Vail his stockholders would welcome the change. He says:

Deferred service bears to profitable operation of the telephone the relation of the "strap hanger," or "stander," to transportation service, but with this difference: The "strap hanger," or "stander," is getting some return for his discomfort; he is getting to his destination—that is, accomplishing his object. The deferred-service telephone user, while waiting, is not getting anything or anywhere; he is sacrificing his time and possibly jeopardizing the purpose for which he wants the connection.

But what does that signify if the patron prefers it, because he can not pay the preferential rate, but can wait, or because he can make more money waiting or the matter at hand does not require momentary attention. Suppose he is a drummer in New York and his child ill 500 miles away. The "immediate" service rate is $3, half or more of his daily wages. He can not afford that. But the average continental rate for that distance is only 37 cents. He is at his hotel, and can put in a waiting call, and perhaps save a sleepless night. And Mr. Vail admits that this is practicable. Yes; and as profitable as the "strap hanger to the transportation service."

All this has been true, I presume, for as long a period as these low rates have obtained with postal institutions.

What a commentary on the private conduct of a postal function; what a commentary on the boasted efficacy of "regulation." We have some 40 State public-service commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission, each with power to act. The above statements have been before them since the early part of 1914; not one of them has acted, despite the well-known fact that the individual patron can hardly have a sufficient financial stake in the matter to undertake a proceeding on his own account. Finally I present this:

Mr. Vail:

Regulation by commissions of high standing, composed of individuals of ability and integrity and good impartial judgment, is the greatest protection to the public interests as against private exactions that ever was devised.

POSTAL EFFICIENCY.

Mr. Vail asks:

Is there anyone who doubts that if the Post Office Department had the organization, the management, that many of the large private industries have it would be possible to give at least the present efficiency and at a much less cost of operation?

Perhaps, if it had the motive. But would it? Does not the experience, just cited, with the long-distance rate rather indicate that we should be paying at least 5 cents for the letter? And with such postage rates, could the average postal employee then have 60,000 mail pieces a year to his credit?

OPERATION.

Operation, economical and efficient, requires high organization continuously maintained, superior methods, and efficient service. There must be supervision by able executives, assisted by experts, all of long experience as executives as well as in the particular industry. They must have large discretionary powers, assume responsibilities, and have undisputed directive authority over subordinates. It is purely administrative and executive in its nature.

And again:

Every new head of a department is of necessity a reformer; his average incumbency is less than four years; there is seldom any continuity of departmental policy and never any continuity of departmental staff. The important assistants come and go with the head.

It is conceded that the above injunctions are sound, and they have not been overlooked in the bill drafted to define the proposition. So far as it is assumed that continuity of technical and expert talent may not be secured to conduct the service as a Government institution, this fear is not sustained by the facts. The Navy and the Army and the Agricultural Departments are each of a kind requiring the kind of special qualifications and continuity of policy assumed. There is in each technical training, expert ability, and even the scientific inventor, as witness Lieut. Col. Squier, whose exploits in electrical invention represent the greatest achievements. Nor is there any break in the required continuity of staff or policy in these cases. Hitherto the Postal System has not seemed to require this, because its methods had become standardized. It proposed its budget to Congress, which was commonly accepted. Development of policy—this was denied it, only because private financiers had absorbed its evolutionary functions in the field of electrical communication. With the parcel post came a new opportunity, which it can fairly be said it has utilized more progressively than any other public service of our time.

But it is proposed to take the telephone personnel and its working practices along with the property; and this includes the superintending staff, the engineers, and entire operating and constructive régime. It is very likely true that it is the best in the world. It ought to be, since the Bell system is not merely the initiator but the largest telephone agency, collecting and expending annually nearly half of the telephone revenue of the world. Moreover, the bill provides a continuing fund for development and extension, without recourse to belated legislative appropriations. The depreciation reserves, which may be deducted from the revenue to the extent of 10 per cent annually, together with $70,000,000 of bonds to be issued from time to time, are made available for this purpose. With all this liberty of action and the same men in charge as now conduct the properties, unless their nature and loyalty should be revolutionized by the mere change of ownership, it is hard to understand why satisfactory technical management and mechanical development should not be attained under postal auspices. Much laughter is excited by the spokesman of the Bell system when describing the trouble and delay of the prospective patron in getting an appropriation through Congress so he can get a phone. This objection, if not fanciful, is merely provisional, and adequate provision is made to avoid it in the only bill that has been proposed.

LEGISLATIVE METHODS.

Mr. Chairman, my object has been to present the economic, social, and institutional features of the subject, and so but the briefest discussion of legal questions will be undertaken.

Method of acquisition: The bill proposed itself condemns and appropriates the telephone network, except farmers' lines, to the use of the Government as of a given date. The transfer of title therefore takes place by force of the statute at the same moment for all the many distinct legal ownerships. This method leaves open only the question of valuation, which, under the Constitution, must consist of "just compensation." Possession may be taken anterior to the act of valuation or payment, provided an appropriation is made to cover the amounts of the awards when found. (10 Am. & Eng. Ency., p. 1068.) The Interstate Commerce Commission is constituted a board of appraisal to value the properties without a jury (Nichols on Eminent Domain, secs. 302–306) and directed to report its awards to the parties, and if either objects the valuation is sent for review to the appropriate circuit court of appeals. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to make payment of the final awards and is directed to issue such 3 per cent bonds as may be necessary for that purpose. On a given date, say, the 1st of January, 1915, the Postmaster General takes possession, retaining the former employees so far as necessary, who are placed in the classified service, which will define the tenure of their employments.

The constitutional power to condemn the properties appears to be clear, independent of the fact that they are means of communication and correspondence and therefore postal instrumentalities. The Supreme Court has frequently decided that the wires possess interstate-commerce characteristics, and has as often affirmatively declared that Congress in its right to regulate commerce may condemn the instrumentalities through which such commerce is carried on; for example, the railroads. (Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U. S., p. 24.) But the constitutional resources are multiple. The military power is now used to construct and operate numerous telephone and telegraph agencies by the War Department, both for Government and private correspondence. The post-offices and post-roads clause, of course, is apposite. It will hardly be denied that the nearly universal postalization of the communicating wires establishes them as postal instrumentalities as much as it does the mail car or pneumatic mail tube, and as to postal instrumentalities the power of condemnation is well established. (Kohl v. U. S., 91 U. S., 367.)

The bill should contain a provision for the allowance of interest on the awards and perhaps its quarterly payment pendente lite, or from the time of Government possession up to the date of payment. Judgments in the Federal courts between private parties now bear interest at the rate provided in the State where the controversy arises; but the statutes do not apply to the Government, which pays none. A rate of 4 per cent is suggested as fair to the parties under the circumstance of a Government guaranty. A greater rate of interest might tempt prolonged litigation in many cases to defer the events of final payment.

It will be observed that the cooperative or "farmers' lines" are excepted from the act of appropriation. There are two reasons for this: First, such lines appear to be giving rates as low as should be desired, about one-half cent per call, and where not already articulated with the commercial lines may be so connected by postal permission. The second reason is that there are some 18,000 to 20,000 of such lines, each under distinct ownership; and if merger into the Postal System be later desired it might be much more efficaciously accomplished by agreements with the Postmaster General than through the methods of statutory condemnation of so great a multitude of ownerships.

The licensing method: To protect its functions and its investments in the field of correspondence it is considered necessary that a monopoly be reserved to the Postal Department for the future, which is according to the practice in nearly all of the leading countries. In our civilization science is likely to develop improved methods from time to time, and it would seem to be the part of prudence to place the postal establishment in a situation where it could take the primary advantage of such progress as may occur. However, there may be, and frequently is, a period when such innovations are purely tentative and experimental and when it may be desirable to grant the private exploiter a temporary privilege, such as patentees are given, in which to put such new ideas into practice. Society might thus employ the fruits of all the pioneering which the Postal System may conduct on its own initiative as well as that of private financiering without the alternative in the latter case of yielding itself over for generations to badly functioning private monopolies. Moreover, there are the present telegraph agencies, which, being left undisturbed, should be placed under license, and thus given definite relations to the postal monopoly.

In order to accomplish these objects the proposed bill first declares a monopoly of the whole field of electrical correspondence and then provides a system of licenses for existing telegraph lines, farmers' lines, and such telephone lines as may be used exclusively by the railways. These licenses may also be extended by the Postmaster General to private parties for developmental construction upon terms to be fixed in the license, so that future conditions and contingencies may be seasonably and rationally provided for without impairment of the principle of postal supremacy.

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE.

Mr. Chairman, since 1871 no less than 17 favorable reports of committees of the House and Senate, providing bills for some form of postal telegraphy, have been made to these bodies. They are:

March 3, 1845. House Report 187, Twenty-eighth Congress, second session. Committee on Ways and Means.
July 5, 1870. House Report 114, Forty-first Congress, second session. (Washburn.) Select Committee on Postal Telegraphy.
House Report 115, Forty-first Congress, second session. (Palmer.)
1872. House Report 6, Forty-second Congress, third session.
1875. House Report 125, Forty-third Congress, second session. (Gen. Butler.) Judiciary Committee.
1881. House Report 137, Forty-sixth Congress, third session. Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.
1883. House Report 2004, Forty-seventh Congress, second session. (Bingham.)
1884. House Report 1436, Forty-eighth Congress, first session. Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.
1888. House Report 955, Fiftieth Congress, first session. (Rayner.) Committee on Commerce.
1870. Senate Report 18, Forty-first Congress, second session. (Ramsey.) Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.
1872. Senate Report 20, Forty-second Congress, second session. (Ramsey.) Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.
1872. Senate Report 223, Forty-second Congress, second session. (Zachary Chandler.) Committee on Commerce.
1872. Senate Report 242, Forty-second Congress, third session. Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.
1874. Senate Report 242, Forty-third Congress, first session. Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.
1875. Senate Report 624, Forty-third Congress, second session.
1884. Senate Report 577, Forty-eighth Congress, first session. (N. P. Hill.) Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.
Senate Report 577, part 2, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.
1896. Senate Document 291, volume 11, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session. (M. Butler.) Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

In not a single instance has one of these bills succeeded in getting before either House for a vote. They were crowded out by appropriation bills and other bills having the right to prior attention in the respective sessions. That is, to use courthouse parlance, the court adjourned at each session before the postal telegraph bill "came up" for trial; when under parliamentary practice a new bill would have to be reported at the next session, and so forth, only, however, to fail again for the want of the momentously valuable parliamentary time. In a generation, I am informed, not a single piece of postal legislation has passed Congress except as a part of the Post Office appropriation bill. Sufficient research would probably disclose that this statement is equally true of legislation relating to the other departments; and Members of Congress will understand why this has been true in the past, and must become increasingly so in the future.

All of which means that there can be no hope for such legislation unless it is made a part of the Post Office appropriation bill. That bill can not be pigeonholed. An independent bill could be, and most probably would be, in the House or Senate. Accordingly, there would be two methods to defeat the measure without its getting a single opposing vote. One would be to have the Post Office Committee report a separate bill; the other would be to have the Committee on Rules of the House to refuse to grant a rule for the consideration of the measure as a part of the Post Office appropriation bill. So far as I know, this committee has never vetoed the action of the Post Office Committee in such a way; and so if the Post Office Committee includes the measure in its appropriation bill, as it did the parcel post, the measure could not fail to come before the House for its action. If this be not done the history of the other 17 postal telegraph bills would become the history of this. It would simply be the eighteenth chapter in a story of never-ending parliamentary jugglery and calendar failures.

SOCIAL PRINCIPLES.

Mr. Chairman, having discussed the numerous other features, I shall devote my closing remarks to the social and institutional aspects of the subject, namely, the effects of the misapplication of private financiering in the field of public economics. The experience of the United States has been almost unique among nations in this respect, for it is only here that the accepted distinction between private and public financiering has been frankly thrown to the winds. Most people have been compelled to draw a very unfavorable comparison between American and foreign municipalities. With a view to explaining this fact I quote again from the work of Prof. Adams. Speaking of our State and local governments, he says:

The policy of restricting public powers within the narrowest possible limits tends to render government weak and inefficient, and a weak government placed in the midst of a society controlled by the commercial spirit will quickly become a corrupt government; this in turn reacts upon commercial society by encouraging private corporations to adopt bold measures for gaining control of government machinery. Thus the doctrine of laissez faire overreaches itself, for the application of the rule which it lays down will surely destroy that harmony between public and private duties essential to the best results in either domain of action.

The great argument against public monopolies is that government is inefficient and corrupt, and this brings us to a consideration of the third class of evils which result from the theory of noninterference as maintained in modern society.

SOCIAL HARMONY MAY BE RESTORED BY EXTENDING THE DUTIES OF THE STATE.

As a class of evils attending the attempted realization of the doctrine of laissez faire may be mentioned the injury worked to established government. The policy of restricting public powers within the narrowest possible limit tends to weaken government and render it inefficient; this leads to corruption on the part of public officials, which, in its turn, invites to yet greater corruption in private practices. Excluding for the present Federal administration, no one will deny the inefficiency of the government of our States, while that of our municipalities is generally regarded as a dead failure. This fact is urged by the advocates of laissez faire as the strongest argument in favor of their doctrine. See, they say, what a weak and halting thing this Government is; it can not do well what now is in its hands; how absurd to extend the range of its activity. There seems to be sound sense in this statement; and yet, notwithstanding its apparent reasonableness, it is believed to rest upon superficial reasoning, for it commits the grave error of mistaking a result for a cause. I would not go so far as to say that the statement would be wholly true if turned end for end, but there is truth in the charge that the inefficiency of local government is, in a large measure, traceable to the endeavor to realize the nolle tangere policy among a people whose energies are directed by the commercial spirit.

The policy of progressive denial of function and the consequent lessened ability of the functionary for efficient service is thus illustrated:

The advocates of noninterference have treated the Government as the old physicians were accustomed to treat their patients. Was a man hot, he was bled; was he cold, he was bled; was he faint, he was bled; was he flushed, he was bled; until fortunately for him he passed beyond the reach of leech and lance. This has been, figuratively speaking, the form of treatment adopted by the people of the United States for their local governments, and it has worked its natural result of feebleness and disintegration.

It is quite possible that some of my readers will protest against such a presentation of the case, resting their criticism upon the well-known tendency toward an increase in legislation in these latter days. This is what Mr. Spencer complains of, and it is also the occasion of that remark, so often heard, that sessions of legislatures are far too frequent. But there are two thoughts which suggest themselves in reply to such criticism:

First. The multiplication of laws, so far from being out of harmony with the theory of individualism as understood by democratic peoples, is a natural consequence of its general acceptance. A philosophy of social relations, like that of laissez faire, which tends to efface the sharp distinction between public and private interests, must inevitably result in an extension of pernicious legislation; for, under the direction of such a philosophy, men feel themselves warranted in using public machinery for private ends. This conclusion is fully sustained by considering the nature of the bills which gain the approval of our modern lawmaking bodies.

Second. It is believed that the above criticism mistakes the true center of public power. The importance of government or the extent of the functions assigned to it is not measured by the amount of legislation which its lawmaking bodies turn off from year to year, but rather by the nature of the administrative duties imposed upon it. Indeed, the stronger the executive department of a government, the less opportunity there will be for particular legislation, and the more likely it will be that such laws as are passed will conform to the just requirements of general laws. It is especially the administrative functions of government that the doctrine of laissez faire attacks; and the strength of the attack lies in this, that individuals desire the opportunity of performing services of "collective interest" under the ordinary rule for private financiering. It must, then, be admitted that the above criticism does not touch the point. The increased legislation which we all deplore does not prove that government is growing strong and extending its range of duties; it is rather the evidence of increasing weakness, for it shows that the government is incapable of adequately defending the public against the encroachment of individuals.

The constitutional history of the various States of the Union, so far as it pertains to the legal restrictions imposed upon their administrative powers, bears directly upon the point under consideration. I can not, of course, present even the outline of this history, but there are two facts well worth a moment's notice. The contemporaneous growth of the power of corporations, on the one hand, and of municipal corruption, on the other, bears for us a deep significance. The rise of corporations into such power that they menace the stability of society, by controlling in their favor legislation, dates from the time when the States were deprived of all direct control over inland transportation.

The causes of State and municipal corruption are said to inhere in such a situation:

In all matters where any possible question arises between government and corporations the advocates of governmental control are obliged to prove their case. At the present time the waterworks in many of our towns are managed by private companies. It is the exception for gas to be supplied through public works, while there is no city, except now Cleveland and San Francisco, so far as I am aware, that maintains control over its street railways. And in perfect harmony with this whole line of policy is the morcellation of government among separate and independent boards rather than the concentration of power in the hands of responsible officials in such a manner as to make it worth their while to attend to business. Under the sway of this policy municipal government has become corrupt, while in many cases corporations have passed the bounds of all decency. These two tendencies have developed contemporaneously, and the question is whether there is any casual relation between them.

As I view the matter, there is certainly a close relation between the rise of the menacing power of corporations and the rise of municipal corruption. They are both an inevitable result of the too great confidence that has been placed in the regulative potency of competition on the one hand and the too great suspicion with which governmental action is viewed on the other. It is impossible, as society is at present organized, properly to correlate public and private duties. The motives leading men in one direction are overpoweringly strong when compared with the motives leading in the other direction. And under such circumstances it is futile to expect that either domain of activity will exercise a healthful regulating influence upon the other.

A line of demarcation between public and private functions essential to moral order and efficiency is presented:

The basis of this distinction has already been suggested. We have said that society, being the fundamental fact disclosed by an analysis of human relations, confines within itself all individual growth and action. The activity which it displays is either public or private; that is to say, the activity of the State, embracing all governmental functions, or that of individuals or corporations, which is undertaken for private ends. But the important point that should be noticed in this connection is that these departments of social activity are constantly acting and reacting each upon the other. The line which separates them is clearly defined so far as the principles are concerned to which each must conform, for the one is subject to the rule of public and the other to the rule of private financiering; but the growth of society demands continuous modification in the assignment of specific functions. Recognizing, then, the mutual relations that exist between public and private duties, it is easy to understand why failure to achieve the best results in one department of activity must injuriously affect the other; and the pertinent question for one who would direct by his thought the development of society is, Under what conditions may the best results be expected from both departments of activity?

This question has already been answered. The best results may be expected when the duties assigned to public officials and the functions performed by private individuals are so correlated that the inducements offered are of about the same strength in both domains of activity. It is, of course, necessary, in applying this rule, to take into consideration other than merely pecuniary motives by which men are led to act. Considerations of social distinction, the desire to exercise such powers as one may possess, the pleasure of filling well a responsible position—indeed, all the varied demands of human nature must be admitted into the account.

The neglect to observe these fundamental conditions, the depreciation of the public functionary, and the demoralization of the invader of public functions are treated thus:

In our own country, on the other hand, one observes that society has developed in the opposite direction. The great prizes here offered are in the line of individual initiative. Our civil, State, and municipal service is so poor that an official has no social position, while a business man who accumulates money is generally regarded with deference. The salary paid by the State is nothing when compared with what men of ordinary talent may secure, either as profit, if engaged in business on their own account, or as salary if working for a private employer. It is therefore no occasion for surprise to learn that in this country we have very perfect sewing machines but poorly administered cities.

One can not fully appreciate this view of the case without calling to mind the possibilities of acquiring wealth in a rapidly developing industrial society. The atmosphere of such a society is intensely commercial, and not only do men of ability and energy refuse to consider a public position as desirable to themselves, but they regard with supercilious condescension one who is willing to assume public office in a municipality. And it may be added in this connection, as bearing on the question of municipal corruption, that the moral judgments of a public officer are very much like those of his neighbors who elect him, and the sentiments which control in the transactions of their daily business will probably give color to his administration. But the ordinary business life of the nineteenth century is such as to render men familiar with methods of speculation and to conform their ethical principles to the law of supply and demand. The spirit of speculation partakes in character of the spirit of gambling. It judges all businesses undertaken on the basis of their pecuniary success, and has little care for the equivalent given for what is gained. A fine sense of what is just can not exist where it prevails, nor can a delicate appreciation of what is honest be long retained by business men.

In his excellent work upon the Philosophy of Wealth, Prof. Clark portrays the moral effect of this transformation in the following language:

"The man of the present day is actuated now by one influence, now by the other, and has two distinct codes of outward conduct. Moral philosophy, indeed, teaches that his fundamental character is one and unchanging; but as there is one code of practical conduct for war and another for peace, so there is one for mercantile life and a different one for the family, the social circle, and the church. The man of business is constantly passing from the jurisdiction of one code to that of another.

"It is a common remark that business practices are not what they should be, and that a sensitive conscience should be left at home when its possessor goes to the office or the shop. We helplessly deprecate this fact; we lament the forms of business depravity that come to our notice, but attack them with little confidence. We are appalled by the great fact of moral dualism in which we live and are inclined to resign ourselves to the necessity of a twofold life."

And what of the effect of these perversions upon the ambitions of public men?

Suppose, now, that a man of good intentions came into office in a community breathing the atmosphere of commercial speculation—let us say the office of mayor in his town or governor in his State—what does he see upon looking into the society whose welfare is placed in his hands? He sees it to be no uncommon thing, where contracts are uncontrolled and where the rule of individual ownership is indiscriminately applied to all of the agencies of production, that fortunes are established in the hands of men and families having no peculiar right to them. He sees also that many businesses which from their very nature must be carried on as monopolies are given over to private control; that the principle of private financiering is applied to them with all its vigor; and that in this manner large fortunes are accumulated and large power over men acquired, exceeding by far the importance of any individual to society. He sees also that in many businesses naturally subject to the regulating influence of competition artificial combinations are established, by means of which monopoly prices are secured from customers. But such privileges as these can not pass unchallenged, and it follows that the important lawyers of every town are retained at large salaries to defend, by their tempered talents, the privileges that monopolies have secured, while other lawyers are hired to depart from their legitimate profession to secure for business men some special legislation. Yet all this lies within the law. It can not be branded as corrupt, although the least sum taken by a public official beyond his stated salary is properly called robbery.

As contrasted with this state of affairs, what does our successful candidate see in the office to which he has been elected? He will not long remain an incumbent before discovering that the position which he sought as a dignity brings with it no honor. What he thought to be a place of responsibility and power proves to be the center of no great influence, demanding in reality little beyond the perfunctory duties of a ministerial officer. He finds there is small demand for the exercise of judgment and a narrow field for the development of manly faculties; he also learns through the sinister suggestions of those whose personal interests he does not forward that his tenure of office is insecure; and, last of all, he finds that his salary does not suffice to keep his family respectably in the social circles in which they wish to move and that the gratitude of republics does not extend to provision for their servants against sickness and old age. Repeating again the assumption that our candidate is honest—at least within the meaning of the law—and that he is conscious of ordinary business capacity, we are warranted in concluding that the career of an official will not harmonize with his tastes. He will, upon the first opportunity, retire to private life, which presents larger scope for efficient activity and where the prizes to be gained are much greater.

Such are the conditions of a public career in most of the municipalities of the United States, and observed results are altogether what might have been expected. The incumbents of local office are usually men of indifferent ability. If not actually depraved, they are at least colorless in character. Among "city fathers" of this sort there appears from time to time the shrewd yet unscrupulous man who for personal aggrandizement assumes complete control over public affairs. This is the explanation of "rings" and "jobs." Public corruption therefore is no accident. It is the necessary result of the idea that the best thing to do with a public official is to lay him on the shelf out of harm's way.

Is it not, then, correct to say that the theory of noninterference, which regards individual enterprise as the only proper depository of industrial power, and which relies wholly on competitive action as the guaranty of fair treatment in business affairs, is an obstacle to the restoration of harmony in social relations? Under the influence of the sentiment engendered by this theory we see corporations to have attained power at the expense of the importance of the States; we see the symmetry of government to have been destroyed; we see the line between public and private interests to have been practically effaced; and, as a natural consequence, the machinery of government easily perverted from its high purpose to serve the private ends of corporations and individuals.

A concrete case of what Prof. Adams has in mind may be given. It relates to the telephone in San Francisco: The Pacific States Co., a Bell company, and a rival, the Home Telephone Co., were engaged in a struggle for possession of the field, with stupendous bribes as their weapons. The Schmitz-Reuf combination was in political control. The following narrative is from McClure's Magazine for February, 1911, in the form of a dialogue between "Boss" Reuf and Detective Burns:

"What next?" said I [Detective Burns], when the gas case was finished.

"The Home Telephone Co.—$120,000. Sixty thousand went to the board of supervisors, through Gallagher; the other sixty thousand was divided between Schmitz and me."

("Thirty thousand apiece for them," said Burns, interrupting his story, "while each of the 18 supervisors, poor devils, who were necessary to grant the franchise and who served as a cloak, were glad to get away with their little three thousand apiece.")

There were absolutely no bounds to Reuf's greed. He is the only boss I've ever heard of who never showed an atom of loyalty or gratitude to those who served him. He admittted that, although for years he had received from the Pacific States Telephone Co. $1,000 a month, when Detweiler, of Toledo, president of the Home Telephone Co., outbid the Pacific States, he went over straightway. And in connection with the transaction Reuf told this story:

"The Pacific States Corporation," said he, "attempted to do some individual bribing of the supervisors on their own account. They thought they could beat me," and Reuf swelled out his chest. "Their local agent, Theodore V. Halsey, had made an arrangement with Boxton, of the board, who had promised to procure the pledges of 10 of the supervisors to favor the old corporation—a majority of the 18, you see—when I was informed by some of the board of what was going on. They came to ask me what to do. 'Sure; take the money from the Pacific States people,' I advised. 'All you can get. And then give them the double-cross.' So Halsey started his little game," said Reuf. "Oh, he thought he was laying me out. He engaged a room in the Mills Building; Krause, his secretary, who has since committed suicide in Europe, ushered the supervisors into the inner office, where Halsey handed each a package containing from twenty-five hundred to five thousand dollars. Halsey told them that the balance, making ten thousand for each, would be given them at the expiration of their terms of office, provided they refused the franchise to the Home Telephone Co.

"Halsey paid out about $75,000 in this way," grinned Reuf. "Then, when the Home people got their franchise, he went wild. He came to me and wept and begged me to make the supervisors give him back his money; he said he'd lose his job if he didn't get it back. 'It serves you right, Halsey,' said I, 'for trying to steal my supervisors from me.'" (Burns imitated Reuf's virtuous indignation.) "'But I'll see what can be done.' I then told the supervisors to return to Halsey one-half of the Pacific States Telephone bribe; I knew they wouldn't; only two of them did."

"But I was going to tell you the Reufesque windup of this telephone affair," Burns resumed. "For in this case the boss surely did shine as a dyed-in-the-wool grasp-all. He forced the supervisors to credit their Halsey money to the Home Co.'s account. The Pacific States actually paid their rival's bribes to the supervisors and Reuf pocketed all the Home people gave."

The San Francisco conditions have not been repeated in every city, at least not to the same degree, although they are implicit wherever the temptation and prize are equal, and the municipal government has been weakened by the policy of denying it its powers.

The Federal administration has been excluded—very justly, I think—from the above desertation on the causes and character of municipal weakness and inefficiency. Its functions have not been so badly neglected, and agencies like the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Agricultural Department, the Army and Navy, and the postal system have made it administratively reliable and respected. This fact is recognized by Prof. Adams. He says:

> So far as the Federal Government is concerned, the extension of its powers thus far does not seem to be open to severe criticism, and we are only solicitous as to what this tendency will bring about in the future. The present condition of affairs is easily stated. Men are now coming to realize the disastrous consequences likely to emerge from the continued sway of irresponsible corporate power. They see that an extension of governmental agency can alone retain for them the fruits of an advanced industrial civilization; and, inasmuch as the States are incompetent to deal with such difficult questions, they turn of necessity to the Federal Government.

Municipal phone administration: There has been some suggestion that the interurban and long-distance lines be run by the post, but that the local exchanges be left to municipal administration. The above reflections on the present municipal situation with respect to administrative deficiencies seem to preclude that course. But even should the administrative capacity of our municipalities be restored, as foreign and many home examples indicate they shall be, yet there are grave institutional and objective reasons why the wire service should be completely postalized instead of, as suggested, being partly municipalized. It is the same thing as proposing that the mail trains and the rural delivery should be in the hands of the Government, but that the local post office should be run by the mayor. The examples of all the world are against such a method.

Some of the reasons for this postal solidarity in phone administration in countries like England, Switzerland, and Germany, possessing full-fledged local governing institutions like our own, but exempt from the inefficiency charges we must bear here, are not unlikely the following:

First. Wastes of personnel service in maintaining and management of distinct institutions. Thus during breakdowns of the wires in storms local and long-distance men can be concentrated for immediate relief, if there be but one management.

Second. The postal institution articulates with and embraces all varieties of the population, whether massed in cities, towns, villages, or individual homes. The municipal institution, on the other hand, is limited to a corporate area, while many towns and villages have no administrative machinery and no means of supplying it, whatever the cost.

Third. The postal system by virtue of its universality is able to standardize its rates and service by employing the principle of averages, and thus is able to universalize the service, extending it to points which, while generally necessary, might be locally unprofitable.

It is not perceived what municipal administration of the exchanges could offer in the way of advantages over the postal method, and no such arguments have been presented. Its advocates are probably wholly influenced by the doctrinal view which deprecates all appreciation of Federal activity where local action is possible. But the makers of the Constitution, even in their day, strongly impressed as they were with a preference for local authority, plainly distinguished the function of communication as dominatingly Federal in its character, and so treated it in their grant of powers. There does not seem to be any claim that the Federal discharge of the full postal function of communication would throw the Federal and the State and local governments out of equilibrium. The amount of Federal expenditures is probably much exceeded by the combined municipal, county, and State expenditures. In 1912, the latest data, the Federal expenditures were less than 40 per cent of the whole public expenditures, a disparity which is likely to have continuous growth as the local governments take up the much-needed road improvements of the future—a field they might occupy to much greater advantage and a field likely to fully tax their financial resources.

RÉSUMÉ.

Mr. Chairman, I am only too conscious of the extreme advantage I have taken of the courtesy of the House, and now wish to conclude with a hurried summary of the leading features of the discussion. To be brief, the investigation discloses that our telegraphic rates are the highest among 18 countries, running from 25 cents to $1, while in other countries they average about 12 cents, or a cent a word. The result of these abnormal rates is that we rank but thirteenth as telegraph users, with one and three-twentieths telegrams per person to our credit per annum, while in New Zealand, with the 12-cent rate and our price and wage levels, the use of the telegraph reaches as high as 9 telegrams per person.

Against these conditions it appears that our postal rates average lower than other countries, and that the number of letters here—101 per person—is the highest in the world.

The telegraph companies seem to be lacking in institutional economy or efficiency. The operation of sending a telegram is loaded down with 74 incidental services and processes, not less than 50 of which would be replaced by affixing the postage stamp. Notwithstanding they have the greatest business per office, yet their daily product is 8 telegrams per employee, against 11 for New Zealand, with less than one-third the business per telegraph office. The American inefficiency is further exaggerated by the duplication of telegraph offices in all the important towns and cities, and the denial of the service at many thousand necessary points.

A striking feature is the discovery that the telegraph service is a relatively declining institution, and that it would be unwise now to postalize it alone and as a single service. For 10 years in England the number of telegrams has been actually stationary. To take over the telegraph lines alone and operate them merely as telegraph lines might result in postal bankruptcy. Separated from the telephone, they are not now surely self-sustaining as mere telegraphs. Because you would rather talk with than write to a person, you use the telephone rather than the telegram, if the rates permit. In Germany, where both telegraph and telephone rates are normal, there are five times as many toll or long-distance conversations as there are telegrams, and even in the United States nearly twice as many. There would be no advantage in taking over the telegraph lines; the investigation makes this clear.

But our toll and long-distance rates compare with those of other countries even less favorably than do our telegraph rates. The average interurban receipt in Germany is but 4 cents; here it averages 21 cents. The long-distance rates here are made on a scale of 6 mills a mile per three-minute conversation, as against an average charge of about 7 mills a mile received by the railways for transporting a ton of freight. The average charge on the Continent for a 300-mile talk is 30 cents; here it is $1.80, or six times as great. It is not unfair to say that the American interurban telephone rates are the scandal of public-service rates the world over. The American telephone monopoly takes the last place among 17 countries with regard to the lowness of these rates.

With respect to local telephone exchange rates, we have three main divisions—the farmers' lines, which cost the average subscriber about a half cent a call; the independents, which cost a little less than 1 cent a call; and the local rates of the Bell monopoly, which average a little less than 2 cents per call, or twice the average charge in other countries. While our postal rates give us the first rank in lowness of charges, this company ranks but twenty-ninth among 31 telephone systems with its local charges, and we one among only three countries where the average local rate approximates the rate for letter postage.

The subscribers' rates in American cities, compared with continental cities, are about three times as high. For example, New York, where 5,400 calls, about 15 per day, under a measured service tariff cost more than the four unlimited yearly rates of London, Paris, Berlin, and Stockholm together. For like services, Baltimore people pay more than the rates for London and Paris combined, and Washington pays as much as the five cities of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Auckland, Tokyo, and Copenhagen combined. In postal-telephone countries the local toll tariffs tend to run about one-half the charge for a letter, while here it runs with the street car fare, and sometimes exceeds it, when it is three times the letter rate.

While competition does not supply a remedy because it divides the service and necessitates the payment for two phones, yet it throws an interesting side light on the tendency of a private monopoly to jack up the rates. Thus of 60 of the great American cities, 24 averaging 342,486 in population, pay an average annual phone rate of $53 under competition; while the other 36 cities, averaging but 188,629 in population, without competition, pay an average rate of $81. Since competition can only augment the total cost of operation it is apparent how private monopoly and high rates go hand in hand.

Telephone development has reached its substantial limits in the United States under private capital with the extension of the service to the very profitable office and well-to-do home traffic. To extend it to the homes of the masses, as the public roads and Postal Service now are extended, the postal agency is necessary. If the telephone lines are postalized, both the telephone and telegraph business can be done over them, as in other countries, where a telegram and a conversation go over the same wire at the same time. It will be unnecessary to take over the telegraph lines here, as both kinds of communication can be handled on the telephone wires, which exceed the telegraph wires in mileage and geographical distribution.

The telegraph lines would have to be substantially reconstructed to add a telephone business to them, while the addition of the telegraph instruments to the telephone wires may be accomplished at a negligible total cost. This circumstance shows the weakness of private monopoly. Instead of duplicating the telegraph network with a separate toll and long-distance system as the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. has done, the postal telegraph countries have made the one network serve for both functions, by articulating the telegraphic with the telephone exchanges.

The cost of acquiring the telephone networks is indicated as about $1,000,000,000; for which it is proposed to issue 3 per cent bonds, payable in 20 years. It is calculated that the Postal System by superimposing the telegraph service on the telephone lines at half present telegraph rates may net some fifty millions annually from that traffic alone, which, with the present profits of the telephones, and after the deduction of interest on the bonds and depreciation, would supply the department with a large surplus for extensions, and so forth.

The telephone rates should be worked out experimentally by the Post Office Department in a few years, with the assured prospect of ultimately securing telephone and telegraph rates, like our letter rates, as low as those abroad. That is, rates about half those now obtaining for the telegraph and local telephone services, and about one-fourth those charged for the long-distance telephone conversation. Our other postal rates, including the highly profitable parcel-post rates, have been made as low as in other countries, and the indications are that like results can be obtained for the wire service when postalized.

The suggestion that the interurban and long-distance lines alone be postalized and the telephone exchanges be left to the municipalities is found to be unsound. The postal system can finance and operate the exchanges the more economically and efficiently, and the divorcement of the exchanges from the interurban and long-distance lines would necessitate the maintenance of two personnels at substantially increased cost. It would be like divorcing the local post offices from the Post Office Department and turning them over to the mayors to run. The towns and cities have enough to do if they give proper attention to those utilities which are distinctly local. Moreover, the farms and countryside villages which are without local administrative governments would not be reached by a municipal service.

The financing of the acquisition and the valuations of the properties would cover several years; and while the properties should be taken at one time with their personnel and systematized the payments for them would have to await the final valuations by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Treasurer paying the owners 4 per cent interest quarterly during the interim. The financing would thus be decentralized into as many payments as there are distinct legal ownerships. It is not thought this financing would involve difficulties seriously greater than those of the Panama Canal. Switzerland has recently successfully financed the purchase of her railways, amounting to about $50 per capita, while the telephone acquisition here would be less than $10.

With respect to management, it is found that our postal system is highly efficient. It ranks next to the highest—Belgium—among 16 countries, and perhaps is actually in advance of her. Our product per average postal employee in 1912 was over 60,000 mail pieces per man as compared with Germany at 37,000 and France at 34,000, countries which rank eighth and tenth, respectively, in postal efficiency. In the matter of telegrams handled per employee, our companies are outranked by New Zealand, notwithstanding the concentration of the telegraph business in a relatively few offices here. The Bell telephone monopoly ranks but ninth in operative efficiency among 16 countries. In 1912 it handled 64,000 telephone calls per employee, as against 118,500 per employee in Norway. This is mainly because its abnormal rates condemn the operative plant to comparative idleness—its interurban lines show but 8 per cent of utilization as against 19 per cent in Germany—while the number of operators engaged in maintenance and other services remain the same, whether the phones are actively or but sparingly used. The Postal System with normal rates might easily double the Bell efficiency in number of calls per employee, and the independents do better it greatly on account of their lower rates and consequent higher utilization of plant and personnel. With the number of calls thus doubled, the expense per call would be practically reduced one-half, and it may thus be seen what the postal motive could accomplish in rate reduction without substantial increase of expense. This illustrates the natural infirmities of private monopoly exercising a postal function, it is without a motive to double the service even where expenses and profits will remain the same.

Such, sir, are the results of a business and economical survey of the field of communication by electricity. In the domain of public morals the lesson is not different. The perversion of the laws of public and private financiering, by which public governments have been disinherited of their normal functions, has led to such corruption and demoralization—of the functionaries giving and the alien claimants receiving the despoiled inheritance—that cities like New York with its street railways, Philadelphia with its gas works, and San Francisco with its telephones, have shamed the scions of Roman corruption in their most dishonorable days. The policy of weakening these governments by alienating their functions to ambitious private finance has made them despised and attractive only to such weak political creatures as see opportunity for individual enrichment. Compare them, sir, with the proud cities of other lands, undespoiled of their rightful attributes of public service and where public position gives honor, prestige, and respect.

[2] That is, in product per employee.
[3] See discussion of telegraph efficiency. Our companies are probably among the very lowest, considering the small number of offices they operate and the consequent density of traffic. They are like the Russian postal system. It maintains only 15,701 offices in an area much larger than the United States; about one-quarter the number maintained here.

NOTE 3.—Government ownership of electrical means of communication, Senate Document No. 399, second session Sixty-third Congress, 148 pages. Its mail, telephone, and telegraph statistics are for 1910, but are translated into English.

NOTE 4.—The data for these are taken from the Bell report of 1912. On page 4 it gives the total calls as 8,472,000,000, of which 97.19 per cent, or 8,233,136,800, were local calls, and 2.81 per cent, or 238,863,200, were toll calls. The number of phones is given (p. 41) as 4,953,447, with a local call revenue of $30.93 per phone (p. 13), or $153,210,115.71, and the number of employees (p. 41) as 140,789.

TRAFFIC.

Including the traffic over the long-distance lines, but not including connecting companies, the daily average of toll connections was about 738,000, and of exchange connections about 25,572,000, as against corresponding figures in 1911 of 645,000 and 23,484,000; the total daily average for 1912 reaching 26,310,000, or at the rate of about 8,472,000,000 per year. [1] Which when reduced to dollars and cents, equals: $55,240,889.61.

[2] These companies (1912 census) represent 1,402,744 phones for which the calls and other financial data are not given. They embrace commercial companies having an annual income of less than $5,000, as also "Mutuals" and "Farmer or rural" lines. In 1907 the census showed a revenue of 47.5 cents per 100 calls for the mutuals, which is adopted as the rate in the above table, and a utilization of 1,128 calls per phone. Allowing the mutuals the same growth (50 per cent) as shown for the rest of the country, since 1907, the number of their phones should have correspondingly increased from the then 125,956. The rurals had 565,649 phones in 1907, and on the same reasoning the "Mutuals" and "Rurals" would show at present about 1,037,407 phones. Together, at the figure given, this would mean 1,170,195,096 phones. The (1907) revenue per phone for the "Rural" was $3.97. This would leave 365,337 (of the 1,402,744 unreported phones) upon which to estimate the calls and receipts. Applying the reported experience of the Independents to them we should have 2,055 calls per phone at 88 cents per 100 calls, equaling the figures given in the table.

NOTE 6.—In 1907 the commercial telegrams were 103,838,242, of which 5,923,483, or 5.70 per cent, were transmitted by railway employees. If a like percentage of the number reported in 1912 census were transmitted by railway employees, as seems probable, then the correct number of telegrams per employee was 2,766 per annum, and per day 7.6.

Sweden: Urgent calls, double rate.

France: From 9 p. m. to 7 a. m. three-fifths, and by monthly contract two-fifths, of day rate.

Italy: 9 p. m. to 6 a. m., 20 per cent less; by contract, 40 per cent less on 6-minute, 50 per cent on 12-minute, and 60 per cent on 18-minute call.

Denmark: Urgent, double rates; night, about 50 per cent reduction.

New Zealand: Night rates, one-half.

Germany: Urgent, triple rates; night, monthly subscription, one-half day rate; one-half rates for daily calls, same persons, same time.

Australia: Press rate per 5 minutes, 65 per cent of 3-minute rate.

Austria: Probably same as Hungary.

Hungary: Urgent, triple rates; night, one-half rates for press.

NOTE 8.—The 1909 express report showed a receipt of 50 (50.64) cents per package. The 1914 receipts were $158,879,059, and the 1913, $168,880,923, which, at a like rate per package, would give the figures used in the text. While their rates have been reduced some 15 per cent since 1909, the parcel post having taken from them the packages carrying the minimum rates, has probably balanced the 15 per cent reduction, leaving the average receipt per package by express about the same.

NOTE 9.—The first change made in parcel-post rates, August 15, 1913, was to raise the weight limit from 11 to 20 pounds up to 150 miles and to reduce the rate from 3 to 1 cent per pound on the 50-mile zone and from 4 to 1 cent on the 150-mile zone. January 1, 1914, the weight limit was raised to 50 pounds up to 150 miles and to 20 pounds for any distance. The rates on the respective zones were reduced as follows:

To 50 miles from 3 cents to 1 cent per pound.
To 150 miles from 4 cents to 1 cent per pound.
To 300 miles from 5 cents to 2 cents per pound.
To 600 miles from 6 cents to 4 cents per pound.
To 1,000 miles from 7 cents to 6 cents per pound.
To 1,400 miles from 9 cents to 8 cents per pound.

The effect of these changes on the traffic has been to raise the number of shipments from 1 pound and up, as indicated by the counts, as follows:

Count of April, 1913	2,820,623
Count of October, 1913	4,347,722
Count of April, 1914	6,926,034
Count of October, 1914 (increase, 182 per cent)	7,955,264

The counts were for the 50 largest cities, representing approximately 62 per cent of the parcel traffic, and indicate an annual flow of traffic of—which is at the rate of about 3 per capita, as against 4 per capita in Germany and 9 per capita in Switzerland. The high traffic of the Swiss seems to be induced by the very low rates, the minimum being 3 cents, as against 6 cents in Germany and 5 cents here.

April, 1913	109,200,000

NOTE 10.—Brief for a general parcel post, May, 1913, addressed to Postmaster General Burleson, by David J. Lewis, Member of Congress, Library of Congress.

NOTE 11.—Except for the Bell system, the rates are for "two-number" services. Norway, for the "particular-person" service, adds 27 mills for distances up to 100 miles; 57 mills for longer distances. Sweden and Denmark add 67 mills for all distances, Germany adds 60 mills, and Austria 61 mills for all distances. The mill is American currency; i. e., 10 mills equal 1 cent.

NOTE 12.—Commercial Bulletin No. 7, March, 1914, American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

NOTE 13.—Much point is made of the fact that under the American rate the words in the address and signature are not counted. That the granting of these words costs the companies but trivially is shown by the circumstance that some countries charge as little as 2 cents for 10 words above a given number, while even the companies charge less than a half cent a word on 50-word night letters. Whether a message contains 5 words less or more, while important to the patron, is of negligible operative significance if it is getting the highest rate that telegram will pay and move.

URGENT RATES.

An effort is also made to class the American rates with the double or triple charges in some countries for urgent and preferred service. There is no such service here, and if there were it would be as little used as in those countries.

NOTE 14.—The American "toll" and long-distance messages numbered 340,000,000, as given in the census of 1912. Of these it is estimated that one-half consisted of local calls, such as cash calls in booths and by guests in hotels, etc., all of which are included under the word "toll." The estimate is based on the opinion of a competent telephone student.

NOTE 15.—The number of telegraph offices in 1907 was (census) 29,056, of which 6,828 were commercial offices maintained by the telegraph companies and the others railroad signal offices. In 1912 the whole number of both kinds of offices was 30,781, but no segregation is made. Taking the same percentage as in 1907, the commercial offices number 8,499, as given in the text.

NOTE 16.—The data are taken from the following news item of December 10, 1914:

Gives telephone values. Accountant testifies company's property in New York City is worth $65,961,661. Basing his computation upon the book accounts of the New York Telephone Co., Dean Langmuir, accountant, yesterday testified before the public service commission, in the Metropolitan Building, that the value of the plant of the telephone corporation in New York City is worth $65,961,661. This estimate, given for the first time, was regarded as valuable by counsel for civic organizations and individuals who have asked for a reduction of telephone rates in this city.

At the outset Seymour Van Santvoord, chairman, and William Temple Emmet, member of the commission, intimated that testimony bearing only upon the plant of the telephone company in New York City would be considered, which caused rejoicing among the petitioners, who are seeking a reduction of rates between the various boroughs.

According to Mr. Langmuir, the central-office equipment of the company is worth $14,001,178; land and buildings, $14,725,350; station equipment, $3,656,166; station installments, $2,632,386; private branch exchanges, $4,579,747; booths and special fittings, $643,432; exchange lines in New York City, $20,491,931; and toll lines, $3,349,554.

And number of phones from New York Public Service Commission:

Manhattan	375,567
Bronx	33,748
Brooklyn	105,383
Queens	24,098
Richmond	7,340
	546,136

A like report from Baltimore shows an investment of $132 per phone September 30, 1910; number of phones, 43,000; book investment, $5,781,356, less depreciation, $115,627. I do not know whether it includes the toll lines. It should not, since the value given was posted for an adjustment of local rates only. However, since the Bell report (1913) gives its average cost of construction as $111 per phone, and including toll $141, while the average for the United States, including the independents, local and toll, is $147, it is apparent that the investment costs per phone in the large cities would not alone justify the disparity in rates. The $111 local investment per phone is derived from the Bell report of 1913, where the cost per mile of toll-line wire is given as $70 and the wire mileage as 2,333,541, $30 per phone for toll lines, and $141 per phone for local and toll.

NOTE 17.—The rate quoted for New York is applicable within and restricted to the Borough of Manhattan; calls beyond the Borough of Manhattan are subject to a toll charge in addition.

[1] Does not include labor at or in connection with toll board.

The great economy of the automatic system in the case of main exchanges seems to begin at 5,000 subscribers and increases with their number until it becomes as much as one-half of the total working expenses at 40,000 subscribers. The economy consists of three main items—the elimination of the operator, the reduction in the average length of subscribers' wires, and the cheapening of the switchboard unit through complete pliancy to increasing subscribers.

The system has been adopted by the postal establishments of Germany, Austria, France, England, Italy, Australia, and New Zealand, and has been introduced into Canada, Denmark, the Argentine Republic, Cuba, and the Hawaiian Islands and the Far East, and I am informed is in use by the Bell system at Newark, N. J., experimentally, while the Federal Telephone Co., of Buffalo, has recently substituted it in place of the familiar manual system.

Besides its financial economy, it possesses some other advantages, among which is the circumstance that it gives an all-night service under circumstances when the night business might not justify the employment of an operator. Two principal changes would be involved in imposing it on the present manual system, namely, the substitution of an automatic exchange and the attaching of a dial on the receiver.

See Automatic Telephony, Smith & Campbell, McGraw Hill, N. Y.

Monthly Journal, Automatic Electric Co., Chicago.

NOTE 19.—According to the census the average cost per 1,000 calls for exchange operators was $2.36, or a little less than a quarter of a cent a call.

NOTE 20.—The toll and long-distance table includes all calls except those between subscribers locally, for all countries.

NOTE 21.—These data have been courteously supplied by the Bell system. The number of business phones in Cumberland (November, 1914) was 1,220 and in Washington (July, 1914) 20,088.

The following bill, except matter in brackets in sections 6 and 3, is tentatively presented by the Post Office Department to provide for the acquisition and operation of the telephone network:

A bill to secure to the United States a monopoly of electrical means for the transmission of intelligence for hire; to provide for the acquisition by the Post Office Department of the telephone networks; and to license certain telephone lines, radio and telegraph agencies.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote the Postal Service the Postmaster General of the United States is hereby vested with a monopoly of the function and means of electrical communication for hire within the United States and the Territory of Alaska except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. The telephone systems and networks within the United States and the Territory of Alaska employed in the transmission of communications for hire, and such as may be necessary of the central-office equipment, underground cable, underground conduit, aerial cable, aerial wire, poles, building cable, subscribers' stations, including indoor wiring and drops to premises of subscribers, private branch-exchange switchboards, land, buildings, furniture and fixtures, tools and teams, stores and supplies, and all other property used in the telephone service and appropriate and necessary for the operation of the same by the United States, are hereby declared to be, and the same are hereby, condemned and appropriated to and for the use of the United States of America, to be used by it for such public purposes as may be proper: Provided, That this section shall not apply to telephone lines known as farmer lines.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General, and he is hereby empowered and directed, on the 1st day of July, 1916, to take charge and possession, in the name of, for, and by the authority of the United States of America, of all long-distance telephone lines, and of such interurban toll telephone lines connecting therewith, condemned in section 2, as he may deem advisable. He is further empowered and directed to take charge and possession, immediately or within a reasonable time, of the remaining telephone properties condemned in section 2 of this act, in their entirety or by operating units or divisions or such part thereof as he may deem wise; and it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to use the properties and facilities of which he has taken possession in conjunction with the Postal Service for the transmission of telegrams, messages, correspondence, and communications under such rates and regulations as he may prescribe in order to promote the usefulness of the service to the public and to insure the receipt of revenue adequate to pay the cost of such service, including depreciation and a sinking-fund charge of 1 per cent per annum on the aggregate amount of the bonds issued for said properties and interest on the bonds which may be issued therefor. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to use so much of the revenue arising from the telephone and telegraph business as may be necessary to employ persons to operate the service, to pay rents, the costs of maintenance, and such other expenses as may be essential in the conduct of the service, and shall render a report in detail of such expenditures to Congress at the beginning of each regular session thereof.

The positions of all employees engaged in operating the service under this act shall be within the classified civil service of the United States, but any employee who remains in the service after the properties are acquired by the Post Office Department shall not be given a classified status until he establishes, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Civil Service Commission and to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General, his capacity for efficient service.

There is hereby constituted a board of directors of the Post Office Department to consist of seven persons, as follows:

Two telephone electrical engineers, one person skilled in the parcel or express traffic, two persons skilled in financial matters, one person skilled in transportation, one person experienced and skilled in postal administration.

It shall be their duty to act in an advisory capacity to the Postmaster General on matters affecting the administration and development of the Post Office Department, to initiate improvements in the service to the public, and safeguard the revenues thereof. Their tenure of office shall be 10 years, and salary $10,000 per annum, payable monthly. They shall be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, from a list of 14 persons submitted to the President by the Interstate Commerce Commission (Civil Service Commission) and certified by it to be specially reliable and expert in their respective professions.

SEC. 4. That immediately after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to proceed to appraise the values of the properties condemned and appropriated by section 2 of this act, such appraisals of the parts to be made in the order in which the Postmaster General elects to take them over and award to the respective owners thereof just compensation therefor, and said Interstate Commerce Commission shall, as soon as possible, file an inventory of the physical assets in use and useful in conducting such service and the values of the same, proper allowance being made for depreciation. Each Commissioner of Interstate Commerce shall make oath before a judge of a court of the United States to faithfully perform such duty, and each person employed by said commission for such purpose shall make oath before one of said commissioners to report to such commission all facts and circumstances connected with the determination of the values of such properties. The said Interstate Commerce Commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to summon witnesses with books and papers before it for either of the parties, and to require such witnesses to testify, and it shall give to each party a full hearing on the compensation to be awarded; and it shall be the duty of said commission to file a separate award of appraisal for each distinct ownership of such condemned properties, and give notice of the filing of such award to the Postmaster General and the owner thereof It shall be the further duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe such methods of keeping records and accounts as may be necessary to determine the changes, by improvements and extensions and depreciation in the condition of the properties appraised and the changes in the values thereof between the date of the original appraisals and that of taking possession by the Postmaster General, if any such interval there be, which differences in values, if any, shall be added to or deducted from such original awards. And if either party be dissatisfied with the amount of such award it may, on appeal by either party, be reviewed by the circuit court of appeals of the United States having jurisdiction where the owner has its principal office, which circuit court of appeals is hereby vested with jurisdiction for such purpose; and an appeal may similarly be taken from such circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States for a final review of the amount of the award. Such final award shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date the Postmaster General shall have taken possession of the property until the date of its final payment, which interest may be paid quarterly to the owners pendente lite on such principal sum as may, for that purpose, be agreed upon between the Postmaster General and the owner; the excesses or shortages, if any, of payments of interest, as determined by the amount of the final award, to be credited or debited thereto as the award may finally warrant.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make payment to such telegraph and telephone owners of the money adjudged to be due them by said awards as aforesaid out of the Treasury of the United States, and said telephone owners shall be entitled to payment of such awards as compensation from the Treasury of the United States after the Postmaster General takes possession of the property valued in said awards, and the amounts of said awards are hereby appropriated to the parties entitled thereto out of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued from time to time in the proper form bonds of the United States of America in denominations of $20 or multiple thereof, in such sum or sums as may be necessary to make payment of such awards, and also from time to time, as necessity requires, bonds to the maximum sum of $70,000,000, to be used by the Postmaster General for extensions and improvements of the telegraph and telephone service and to provide for the reimbursement of the depreciation reserves for funds advanced for extensions. Such bonds shall be exempt from all taxes or duties levied by the United States or any State, county, or local governing body, and the interest thereon shall be paid quarterly. All citizens shall have an equal opportunity to subscribe therefor, and a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of such bonds, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the Treasury to defray the cost of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same. Said bonds shall be payable within 50 years from the date of issue and shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain a fund for the payment of such interest and for the redemption of the bonds issued under this act; and for such purposes the Postmaster General shall pay quarterly out of the receipts of such service into the Treasury of the United States a sum equal to such interest and a redemption charge equal to 1 per cent per annum of the aggregate awards. The said sinking fund shall be invested from time to time in such securities as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem secure and profitable. The sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $500,000 of which sum may be used by the Post Office Department and a like sum by the Department of Justice in order to defray the expenses incurred by these departments incident to acquiring such properties.

Until January 1, 1920, there shall be paid from the revenues by the Secretary of the Treasury to the respective States, municipalities, counties, and minor civic authorities the same amounts in taxes payable by the owners at the time the Postmaster General shall take possession, and he shall make provision to continue any institution for the relief of injured, sick, or superannuated employees which he may find in operation.

SEC. 7. That the Postmaster General shall annually set aside out of the gross receipts of the telephone and telegraph business a sum not to exceed 10 per cent of the value of such telephone properties owned by the United States as a depreciation fund which he may invest and expend to extend and develop such systems of electrical communication, and the Postmaster General may lease, purchase, or condemn in the name of the United States such property as may be necessary therefor, including, by agreement, "farmer lines." He may also confer the privilege by license on any State, county, municipality, company, association, or individual, under such regulations and conditions as he may prescribe, to construct and operate telegraph or telephone lines as well as telephone exchanges and radio stations, or he may require that the same be operated by the Post Office Department, but he shall stipulate in said license the right of purchase by the United States.

SEC. 8. That the existing telegraph companies which have accepted the provisions of the act of Congress of the 24th day of July, 1866, are hereby licensed to do a telegraphic business, subject to the act to regulate commerce between the several States, until they are acquired. The lines of telegraph or telephone which are now or hereafter may be used in connection with the operation of any railroad are hereby licensed to do an exclusively railroad business; and the existing "farmer lines" and radio and wireless stations are hereby licensed to do a telephone and radio business, subject to the provisions of existing laws. And the owners of the telephone properties condemned in section 2 of this act are also hereby licensed to continue the business in which they are engaged until said properties are taken possession of by the Postmaster General under section 3 of this act.

SEC. 9. Whoever shall construct and operate any telephone or telegraph line for the conveyance of messages or communications for hire without first securing from the Postmaster General a license so to do in accordance with section 7 of this act shall be fined not less than $1,000, or imprisoned not less than one year, or both.

Whoever shall willfully interfere with the operation of any telephone or telegraph line operated by the Post Office Department or with the transmission of any telephone or telegraph message over lines operated by the Post Office Department or with the delivery of any such message, or whoever being employed by the Post Office Department shall divulge the contents of any such telephone or telegraph message to any person not authorized to receive the same shall be fined not exceeding $1,000, or imprisoned not less than one year, or both.

All statutes relating to offenses against the property belonging to or in use by the Post Office Department, or the embezzlement, conversion, improper handling, unlawful retention, use, or disposal of postal or money-order funds, and to offenses against the mails, and the punishment provided for such offenses are hereby made applicable to the telephone and telegraph and radio service operated by the Post Office Department.

All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am opposed to this legislation, which substitutes other officers in the Postal Service for the assistant postmasters. In the post office in the city of Atlanta, in my district, the receipts are about $1,450,000 a year. On account of the great volume of business done there the assistant postmaster in that office is the real administrative officer. I see by the provisions of this bill that his salary will be decreased about $600 a year. The bond given by a postmaster to the Government of the United States in a post office of that size is a large one. While it is true that under the system proposed here the postmaster would have the same right of selection of the superintendent of finance that he has of the assistant postmaster, the duties imposed under the provisions of this bill on what is now the assistant postmaster are greatly multiplied, and I do not believe that in an office where the receipts are nearly $1,500,000 any one man can comply with the duties imposed by this bill.

Now, as I said, the postmaster gives the bond. He is responsible to the Government of the United States for not only the administration of the office, but he is the guardian of all the Government property—its stamps, its money-order business, its registry business—and he selects the man in whom he has confidence to administer the duties imposed upon the present assistant postmasters. I do not believe that it is possible, and I have read this bill pretty carefully, to get any one man on earth in a very large office to intelligently discharge the duties that are imposed under the provisions of this bill.

Now, there is nothing in this political talk indulged in by Members about putting Republicans in and Democrats out, or Democrats in and Republicans out. We do not enter into this argument at all as to whether it is wise or unwise, because under the present system, if there happens to be a Republican who is obnoxious to a postmaster, all on earth he has to do is simply to recommend his demotion and he is demoted. I do not suppose that there is a single instance where there has been proposed that an assistant postmaster be demoted under this or any Republican administration that it has not been adhered to by the department.

Then it gives a right to the postmaster himself to select who shall be his assistant postmaster. Now, I do not think that any man who is handling a million and a half dollars of the funds of this Government ought to be handicapped in the selection of his assistant.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. With pleasure.

Mr. STEENERSON. In the case of Atlanta, is it not a fact that the assistant postmaster would be required under the new plan to do additional work and for about $600 less pay?

Mr. HOWARD. That is true. That is what I remarked a moment ago. You have multiplied his duties and reduced his salary.

Mr. STEENERSON. And he must also give a bond and pay for it.

Mr. HOWARD. That is true. Now, I will say that I do not believe that this piece of legislation will be satisfactory to my district. In fact, I know it will not. I am in favor of economy, and my record here is consistent so far as economy is concerned, but I am not going to indulge in foolish economy. [Applause.] I am not going to dissatisfy or disarrange the post-office employees in the city of Atlanta by reducing salaries and increasing the labor. That is what this does. You get the service demoralized by doing such a thing as this; you can not get the most efficient service from these men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL].

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if any of you have seen any of the reports that are supposed to have been gathered during the period of October 1 to the 15th on the results of the parcel post. Last week I had occasion to go to New York for the special purpose of determining the status of profit or loss on the parcel post as it affects New York City and Brooklyn. I made the statement to the New York World reporter that the New York people, the unsophisticated, the not-knowing ones, who have implicit confidence in our Government, were held up to the tune of over $1,000,000. I now say a million and a half. I came from New York, after having worked on that report for several days, to get the leave of our post office, from the assistants at the building down here, to check it up, and I was told that the reports were not available. Have any of you gentlemen seen the reports? Now, in order that you may know what I said in the New York World, I will ask to have the Clerk read this article to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

ONE MILLION DOLLARS A YEAR "LARCENY," HE SAYS, BY PARCEL POST—REPRESENTATIVE KINDEL ASSERTS NEW YORKERS PAY ANNUALLY THAT MUCH EXCESS OVER EXPRESS RATES—THE PUBLIC SLOW TO USE FARM-TO-TABLE SERVICE—4,940 PACKAGES BETWEEN 20 AND 50 POUNDS SHIPPED HERE WITHIN 150-MILE ZONE IN TWO WEEKS.

Representative GEORGE J. KINDEL, who was sent to Congress largely because of his 20-year fight for equitable express and freight rates for Denver, has been in New York since last Thursday looking into the operation here of the parcel post. He went back to Washington last night declaring that he had "new proof of the petty larceny of the system."

"New York people," he said to a reporter for the World, "are paying not less than $1,000,000 a year more for service by parcel post than they would for the same service by express. For distances of from 50 to 150 miles the parcel post beats express, and for uninsured 5-pound packages up to 600 miles. But beyond that it's very different.

"Between New York and Boston the parcel-post rate on 20 pounds is 44 cents. Post Office officials say they pay the railroads 33 cents for this haul, but the express company will pick up the package, insure it for $50, and deliver it at the other end, all for 36 cents. Isn't it petty larceny for the Government to accept 44 cents for service that a man can get done next door for 36 cents?

EXTRA INSURANCE FEE.

"To get $50 insurance by parcel post means an extra fee of 10 cents. When that is taken into consideration, parcel-post rates meet express rates on 5-pound packages in the 300-mile zone, they practically meet them on 10-pound packages in the 150-mile zone, and they do meet them on 20-pound and 50-pound packages in that zone. When you get to the 1,000-mile zone—New York to Chicago, for instance—the insured rates by express and parcel post are, respectively, as follows: Five pounds, 31 and 42 cents; 10 pounds, 42 and 72 cents; 20 pounds, 64 cents and $1.32.

"Now, here comes the thing that angers me. The new express and parcel-post rates which went into effect February 1 last were fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which said to the express companies, 'You must put in these rates,' and to the Post Office Department, 'You may put in these rates.'

"When was the commission right—when it ordered the present express rates or when it approved the present parcel-post rates?

"We are paying $2,000,000 for the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that is the kind of service we are getting. I have been making speeches in the House about this for the past year, and I have been declaring that if we were statesmen instead of false alarms we'd appoint a committee to investigate the commission and do what any business house would do—discharge the commissioners or impeach them for dereliction, if not for inefficiency."

TWO WEEKS' TRAFFIC HERE.

While in New York Mr. KINDEL got the figures of the parcel-post traffic here for the two weeks ending October 15. To all zones, 8,994,175 packages, weighing 9,491,747 pounds, were carried in that time, the postage paid being $521,361.54. By zones this business was distributed as follows:

First (50 miles), 811,180 packages, postage, $38,410.57; second (150 miles), 1,125,529 packages, $48,609.21; third (300 miles), 1,262,918 packages, $54,846.03; fourth (600 miles), 1,173,216 packages, $62,675.28; fifth (1,000 miles), 1,411,718 packages, $74,035.48; sixth (1,400 miles), 1,243,944 packages, $69,275.07; seventh (1,800 miles), 770,929 packages, $72,919.77; eighth (over 1,800 miles), 773,129 packages, $83,375.72.

"You will notice from these figures," Mr. KINDEL said, "that the average weight of the packages was less than 1 ounce over 1 pound. The meaning I read in that is that people are chiefly sending by the 'new' parcel post the things they sent by the 'old.' The great glory of the parcel post, you know, was to be its effect on the cost of living—as the Democratic 'record of achievement,' used in the last campaign, put it, 'so that the life of the city man as well as the farmer has been made easier and cheaper.'

"You are not going to reduce the cost of living by packages that weigh a pound each. This result was to have been achieved by the extension of the parcel post to packages weighing 20 pounds, a limit that has since been raised to 50 pounds. Well, what happened in New York during these two weeks?

"In the local, first, and second zones the number of packages weighing above 21 pounds was 4,940; their weight was 141,482 pounds, and the postage paid on them was $1,378.99. The bulk was just one-sixtieth of 1 per cent of the total.

BEATING THE PARCEL POST.

"If you in New York want to know exactly how the parcel post works out, ask a mail-order man about it. He will ship 100 pounds by express to Des Moines, for example, break the package up there into five 20-pound parcels, and reship by post. He will save $5 per 100 pounds on the all-parcel-post rate by doing so.

"They are doing it right along, and in their saving they are figuring the hire of the boy that breaks bulk and pastes on the stamps at the reshipping point.

"Let me give you one other illustration of our system: Lord & Taylor have houses in both this country and Germany. The rate on their 11-pound parcels from Germany to Cuba is 50 cents; to Costa Rica, 55 cents; to Mexico, 55 cents; to Nicaragua, 85 cents; to Panama, 60 cents; to Colombia, 90 cents. The tax levied on parcels from their American houses to all countries with which we have parcel-post conventions is $1.32. From Germany they can post 11 pounds to San Francisco for 81 cents; from New York the rate is $1.32.

"What I want to do about all this is to have the weight limit increased, first of all, to 100 pounds. Then I want the rates revised. To illustrate what I would do, let me take a shipment from Baltimore or St. Paul to New Orleans. The express rate in each instance is $4, of which approximately one-half is paid to the railroads. The parcel-post rates are $6.02 and $8.01, respectively.

HIS IDEA OF RATES.

"If I were the Government, I would say: 'Mr. Railroad, in order that you shall not have any complaint, and since you dare not attack the rates fixed for you by the Interstate Commerce Commission, instead of giving you $2 I will give you 50 per cent more; I will pay you $3.' Then I would add the rate that Postmaster General Burleson figures for the delivery of the parcel, namely, 30 cents. That would produce a parcel-post rate of $3.30 instead of $6.02 or $8.01.

"You can't get away from that. It's a question of mathematics and, since it is, the next generation will have a real parcel post, even if we don't get one."

Mr. KINDEL has worked out a complete parcel-post tariff on this basis, and he said last night that he meant to devote as much of the remainder of the present session as possible to impressing its merits on the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINDEL. Can the gentleman from Minnesota kindly extend my time?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Chairman, I would say the only one way to arrive at that is to build a map and take 50 points, or any other number of points, and distribute them and then have them interlocking one with the other. I have done that in this case [exhibiting map] and find that the city of Portland, Me., out of 23 points I have named here in green, there are 50 points where the parcel-post rate on 20 pounds is 50 per cent higher than the express rate. My contention is that a post office, to be honest, should put a sign on the outside in a case like this for people to see, "If you want to save money, ship by express, because we will have to charge you anywhere from 50 to 100 per cent higher in some cases." I say it is wrong. It is not the smart, it is not the business man whom it catches, but it is the unsophisticated. In New York alone, as I pointed out at the outset, there was lost over a million dollars. Whom was that taken from? Not from the very rich, but from the unsophisticated I again say, who do not know the real condition that applies, because at one point the rate is right, but, as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] so ably pointed out this morning, on the average distant point you find the parcel post is entirely out of line with every other line of transportation. You are loading down, you are defrauding the mail service by insisting on pe'k'ng on the rural and star route all of this first and second zone parcel-post business. I my own State we can ship from Denver to Steamboat Springs at $1.04, and by freight it is $1.60. We no longer need the cow train or freight train. We do it all by passenger train now. The parcel post, more than anything else, is knocking out our railroads. I believe in being fair in all things, and if we had some of these assistant postmasters engaged in looking into——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINDEL. Having been given but seven minutes to discuss so important an economic question as the parcel post, which affects every citizen in the land, it is ridiculous to expect that it can be intelligently discussed in so brief a time and explain why the House of Representatives and the Senate have such a meager fund of information on the subject.

The published interview, just read, brought forth several letters of commendation, among which are these highly prized letters, as follows:

["Davies cars"—Fast freight refrigerator service—Economy, safety, and efficiency—6 Harrison Street.]

NEW YORK, December 22, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE J. KINDEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I was agreeably surprised and edified upon reading the interview published in the World this morning setting forth some of your instructive views on railroad matters.

I was sorry that I had not known of your coming here. It is always a real pleasure with me to discuss with you the tragedies of transportation that are presented before the American people under the auspices of their Government.

I am always glad to inspect the last contribution of the hides of the vermin that are nailed on your barn door. The time is not far distant when even the vermin themselves will observe the collection and take note of it.

This splendid service which you have been doing for the people at such personal sacrifice and labor to yourself is, to anyone interested in the problems as you discuss them, a source of valuable instruction, and if you can keep this up for a year or two a much greater good will be accomplished than through any attempt that you may make to tell a bunch of honorable gentlemen in Congress anything that relates to transportation questions. It is only by building a fire under our Congressmen, such as you are doing, that gives the people encouragement and hope that after a while—if you make it hot enough—they will warm up to the subject and manifest their approval of your honest and tireless efforts.

Very sincerely, yours,

ED. GEO. DAVIES.

COBBLE HILL FARM, Lanesboro, Mass.

Congressman GEORGE J. KINDEL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am much gratified to note from the newspapers that there is at least one Congressman who is thoroughly alive to the disgraceful conduct of the Post Office Department, which is doing business under false pretenses in regard to parcel post. It is more than surprising that such unjust treatment of the railroads and other carriers of mail should be sanctioned by the officials who are responsible for the formulating of administrative plans. * * * The parcel post should be run on an equitable and honest basis or not at all.

You have taken the right and honest side of the parcel-post matter. Will be glad to learn of any action looking to the operation of a parcel post void of robbery and injustice.

Very truly, yours,

HENRY I. NEWELL.

Under leave to print I must ask your indulgence to again publish in the RECORD comparative tables of parcel post and express tariff for your perusal, more particularly a graduate on 20-pound parcel post, which is the weight limit beyond the second zone at present; also a graduate on the 100-pound limit, which the Postmaster General contemplates putting into effect soon. These, together with other accompanying tables, will no doubt be of great assistance to students and prospective shippers of parcels, epecially to the credulous and unitiated, who believe in the false statements sent out by the Post Office Department that the present parcel post has cheapened the cost of living.

On my return from New York I asked to see the original copies of reports of the New York office, that I might check them over here. I was told very curtly by those in charge, "The reports are not available." Has any Member on the floor of this House seen any of the several reports reputed to have been made on parcel post; and if not, how can we be expected to proceed to act intelligently on the Post Office appropriation bill?

Having, however, obtained sufficient data from the copies of the New York reports, I stand ready to challenge any member of the Post Office Department or the Interstate Commerce Commission, or either or both of the House committees, that none can successfully refute my allegations that Greater New York is paying $1,500,000 excess on parcel post over what it would pay by express on packages weighing over 5 pounds and beyond the second zone per year, providing the report of October 1 to 15, as analyzed, is taken as an average of a year's business.

The main purpose of my address is to inform the unsophisticated, who believe the Government can do no wrong, and thus save them from petty larceny now being practiced on them through the parcel post. It is a case of "Many mickles make a muckle," as shown here, that these many parcels amount to over $16,000,000 in one year's business in Greater New York, of which $1,500,000 is excessive and inexcusable.

Since the numbers of parcels, weights, and zones are known, and the rates of both parcel post and express are published, it only requires a little mathematical calculation to substantiate my charge, on which I stand ready to submit further proof if necessary.

The whopping story by the Post Office Department that parcel post makes living cheaper is not borne out by the facts—see Tables No. 1 and No. 2—neither has the increase of weight from 20 to 50 pounds to the second zone increased the traffic to the volume expected or desired in the East, where it is less than one-half of 1 per cent on packages above 20 pounds to the second zone, when compared with the volume of the entire business, in respect to both weight and proceeds; and how could this be otherwise? Take the 20-pound rate between Chicago and New York, the parcel-post rate is $1.22 uninsured, while by express insured it is only 64 cents. Now, suppose we apply the argument of the Postmaster General on reducing the cost of living through the parcel post, and what do we find? Edibles are 25 per cent less than merchandise rate by express. The merchandise rate on 20 pounds being 64 cents, the edible rate thus becomes 48 cents, as against $1.22 by parcel post, and uninsured at that. What kind of an imagination is here required to make you feel satisfied that the cost of living is made cheaper by parcel post? And yet this political accident of a Postmaster General, who may know all about hog cholera and foot-and-mouth diseases, but who does not know the first principles of transportation, is setting himself up as an authority on economics, and is now presumptuously advocating governmental ownership and control of the telephone and telegraph, notwithstanding his manifest botch of the parcel post herein exposed; and to think that we have a pedagogue of a President, who is supposed to be master of mathematics and economics, who humors such a farce, and, in addition to that, who appoints men on the Interstate Commerce Commission whose greatest recommendation is that they were railroad attorneys and have sanctioned the present parcel-post rates confessedly with a rubber stamp.

HOW IT WORKS OUT.

My friend the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] has been learning something about the parcel post, but not without cost. He likes butter, and he wants the best, which he claims is made in North Dakota. Having repeatedly read the long-winded effusions of our Postmaster General on "how the parcel post aided in making the cost of living cheaper," he concluded to give it a trial, hence ordered an 8-pound shipment of butter. In transit the butter was evidently placed over a heater, for it had melted and leaked out. Mr. YOUNG'S surprise and disappointment can be better imagined than described when he discovered the container empty and 73 cents of canceled stamps plastered over it.

By express this package, insured, would have cost 53 cents. He was informed by the postal authorities that he could not recover the loss, for the reason it was not insured. Mr. YOUNG, like many other parcel-post victims, now uses the express companies, which is cheaper and always insured.

On the express rates the Interstate Commerce Commission says in its report:

No rate prescribed in the order hereto attached has been made without an investigation and hearing. The rates determined by the commission to be reasonable and just have also followed a like exhaustive investigation, and have also been in detail submitted to the analysis and criticism of the respondents and of shippers throughout the country for a period of several months.

That was under Commissioner Lane.

Can our present commissioners say that they examined into the parcel-post rates before putting on the required O. K.? If not, why not? Why did Congress insist that no rates shall be made by the Postmaster General without the knowledge and indorsement of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Again, the generally accepted opinion that the present parcel post is of untold benefit, especially to the rural dwellers throughout the country, was rudely dissipated by the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], who to-day pointed out—

WHY CERTAIN STAR ROUTES HAVE COLLAPSED.

The extension of the parcel post, while a great blessing generally (?), has been fatal to mail routes in the mountains. Pioneers away out yonder who can keep in touch with the world only by means of letters and papers now receive neither. Time was when the mail carrier came through once or twice a week, regardless of storm or the condition of roads; now they come no more. Their bids for carrying the mails, including the 50-pound packages, are so high that the department declines to accept them.

Thus the railroads throughout the Rocky Mountain region are frequently forced to discontinue freight trains and substitute mail cars, for which no adequate compensation has been allowed, and rural routes are often suspended, to the detriment of our citizens and section; yet we are reminded by the Democratic textbook of 1914, in its concluding paragraphs on parcel post, that—

> Eventually parcel post should provide universal parcel-transportation service, moving at true economic rates a sufficient number of direct shipments to reduce materially the cost of living and to ameliorate the condition of all the people.
> Cautiously, vigilantly, earnestly, enthusiastically the present administration is addressing itself to the attainment of this ideal.

The following telegram tells quite a different story:

> MANCOS, COLO., January 1, 1915.
> Hon. GEORGE J. KINDEL, M. C.,
> Washington, D. C.:
>
> December 31 we sent Ganado, Ariz., 10,000 pounds oats parcel post, three equal lots to follow December 26. Shipment refused by postmaster on instructions from Washington. Requested postmaster to wire Washington our expense. No answer yet. Needless delay causing loss at both ends. Can you help us out, or is this parcel post applicable only to mail-order houses or other favorite parties? One thousand pound shipments declined December 30 also.
> MILLER HARDWARE CO.

In the East the Postmaster General is frantically endeavoring to increase the parcel-post business in order to reduce the cost of living (?). In my section and beyond he reverses himself and refuses the business when offered. Where is he right?

The profound indifference of the general public west of the one hundredth meridian on the subject of transportation is amazing; every conceivable transportation discrimination is heaped upon them, coming and going. For a score of years it has been my purpose to call their attention to the facts and arouse them from their lethargy by publishing these tables of comparison.

Of my previous speeches on this subject I have sent out so many that I find myself poorer by several thousand dollars than I was before I was honored to represent my constituency on the floor of this House.

"WHAT FOOLS THESE MORTALS BE."

Because I rubber stamped the cost of my speeches on the back of them, the Post Office Department saw fit to send me a bill for $4,000 for having sent out 200,000 copies. Many inquiries come to me, "Have you paid that $4,000 post-office bill yet?" My answer is, "No; and I never shall (shell out)."

In order that I may not again be caught inadvertently violating the postal laws (?) or depriving myself of the franking privilege, I must inform my readers that I can not longer supply them with my speeches gratis. The cost on the average of a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is about 10 cents. My speech alone in RECORD form will cost probably not more than 1 cent each. I will undertake to supply them to commercial bodies at cost, which I guarantee will not be over 1 cent per copy. All others will please inclose 1-cent stamp for each copy desired. My having inserted this and made it a part of my speech makes it frankable; otherwise not. What a joke!

Now, if our Post Office Department were half as zealous to correct and make efficient, especially the parcel-post branch, as they are to punish an insurgent who continues to fearlessly denounce the idiotic graduate and rules that control the parcel post, or to devote their time and energy to business instead of politics, then we would soon enjoy a beneficent and profitable parcel post, as do the other countries so frequently referred to as model systems.

Just at present the powers that be are engaged in the scandalous performance of ousting the Hon. Joseph H. Harrison, the postmaster of Denver, on account of alleged inefficiency. He is a Republican—enough said. Why make such a hypocritical excuse? Just as soon as the Democratic Senators of my State can agree on his successor Mr. Harrison will be politically decapitated, although he is one of the most efficient and gentlemanly postmasters in these United States. I have known him as a splendid fellow townsman for 35 years. I venture the prediction if tried before a jury of his peers, he not only would be acquitted on the infamous charge but would be commended as an A1 ideal postmaster.

What a travesty on "honor, justice, and efficiency" for the Post Office Department to use these adjectives!

What if we had a captain of industry like Mr. Ford, of automobile fame; Mr. Wanamaker, of department-store fame; Mr. Woolworth, of the tallest-building fame, at the head of our Postal System? With a man of their caliber as our Postmaster, how long would political hacks such as our Third Assistant Postmaster continue feeding at the public crib?

What valuable service has he rendered to entitle him to a perpetual meal ticket at the hands of our Government?

I have repeatedly challenged the department, or any of its champions, to meet me on the floor of the House or elsewhere to reconcile, if they thought it possible, the foolish and unjust graduate and rules I complain of, so that the public may be spared further suffering of the petty larceny tricks the parcel post now imposes upon them.

In view of the fact that President Wilson, in his message of December 8, indicated early adjournment of the House, which reads—

> Our program of legislation with regard to the regulation of business is now virtually complete—

Therefore no action to reform parcel post can be hoped for in the near future which would correct the errors complained of. I now suggest the adoption of this general rule to the public, especially east of the Mississippi River, which should be given the widest publicity through the press and otherwise:

Warning { Never ship above 5 pounds beyond the third zone.
Never ship above 10 pounds beyond the second zone.
Never ship anything edible by parcel post.[1]

The merchants of the country are crying out "Send business men to Congress. Why should business be the football of politics?" But when they get here, unless they have got a working majority, they will not cut much ice with this overwhelming body, which is composed of 95 per cent of Democratic lawyers of whom southerners are largely in control.

However well intentioned and fitted you may be for any special work, you are not permitted to butt in on the circle of control. You ask at headquarters for reports to study and check up, as I did at the Post Office Department, and you are told "it is not available." What are you going to do about it other than I am doing now—to publish to the world the facts in the hope that the people will become aroused and interest themselves sufficiently to select proper and vigilant business men to represent their interests here?

In conclusion, I would call attention to the magazine section of our Sunday papers of January 3, in which appeared another one of the frequent effusions of several pages by our Postmaster General on parcel post on the theme of how the parcel post reduces the cost of living. Here is a sample of his advice:

> When writing to the farmer for his prices it is well to tell him what the same articles are costing in the city markets at the time. This is advisable, because some farmers have an exaggerated idea as to the prices that city people are willing to pay for fresh country produce, whereas others are entirely moderate and reasonable.

"For downright rot and piffle that takes the bakery." Why does not Mr. Burleson publish figures and tables to prove it? "A truth once told, in however feeble voice, is bound to be heard."

The cost of transporting a 20-pound parcel-post package from New York to Newark, N. J., is 24 cents. The parcel post has an advantage there. For distances 50 miles and 150 miles the parcel post beats the express company; but here in this table, No. 2, is shown what the Government pays the railroads for hauling. In the zone from New York to Boston the parcel-post rate on 20 pounds is 44 cents. The Post Office officials say they pay the railroads 33 cents; but the express company picks up the package, insures it for $50, and delivers it at the other end, and does it all for 36 cents. Is it not petty larceny to accept 44 cents for the service when a man can go next door and get it done for 36 cents? And as you go down the line it gets more violent.

In the Saturday Evening Post of January 31, 1914, appeared an advertisement of the express company, showing new and old express rates. Instead of reproducing the old express rates I have substituted the parcel-post rates for comparison and the enlightenment of the public, which is being fluked by both the express company and the United States post office.

The new express and parcel-post rates, effective February 1, 1914, were both in conformity with the Interstate Commerce Commission. When was or is the Interstate Commerce Commission right? When they ordered in the present express rates or when they sanctioned and approved of present parcel-post rates?

From the above table it is the inevitable conclusion that the parcel-post rates are, in round numbers, 50 per cent higher on edibles than express rates, as shown by the following summary:

	Express.	Parcel post.
5 pounds	$15.51	$13.25
10 pounds	23.88	25.85
20 pounds	40.68	51.05

Total	60.06	90.15

NOTE.—Express rates on food products are 25 per cent less than on merchandise. No reduction by parcel post on same. Express rates carry $50 insurance without charge. Parcel-post charges 10 cents extra for $50 insurance.

	" " "	Food—K. & B.	3.64	4.75—K. & B.

Legend.—The food rates are 25 per cent less than merchandise—by express. The K. & B. rates are combination of Kindel and Burleson rates.

Here (see Table No. 4) I have taken three points—that is, one point with three points—and I show you the parcel-post rates there are $6.02, $8.01, and $10.01 on the 100 pounds. I am giving the mileage between points for convenience sake. Here [pointing] is Denver to Cincinnati, the second example on the diagram. The rate by parcel post, 100 pounds, would be $8.01, or by express $4.30. Now, if it is a food product or a drinkable product—except candy—then it is allowed 25 per cent less, or $3.23 by express. If you apply the Kindel-Burleson system of mine to the latter, it is $2.71 on food products as against $8.01, the parcel-post rate. The merchandise express rate is $4.30, which, under the Kindel-Burleson system—which pays the railroads 50 per cent more than express companies—it would be $3.52 as against $8.01. And you tell me it can not be done? That the parcel post is so neglected by Congress, which permits the compounding and perpetuating of gross errors herein indicated is, to say the least, surprising.

Every State having two Senators, I selected two cities in each State that are on railroad and enjoy both express and post office, with the following result.

The rates are on 20 pounds, the present weight limit beyond the second zone.

100 pounds. This graduate can be extended to any weight without discriminations.

The rate is found by multiplying the pounds by the zone and adding 3, the overhead charge, except in the local zone, where the rate is found by dividing the weight in pounds by 2 and adding 3. Thus the rate on 10 pounds in the local zone is 10÷2=5+3=8. Fractions are disregarded. The rate on 10 pounds to the eighth zone is 10×8=80+3=83.

The ounce rate to be 1 cent per ounce until the pound rate is reached, when the pound rate shall apply.

For packages of unusual or excessive dimensions the charge should be made upon a basis of 10 pounds per cubic foot.

ANOTHER PARCEL-POST OR "16 TO 1" PUZZLE—WHAT IS IT; A JOKE OR AN OUTRAGE?

Parcel-post rates to eighth zone.

1-ounce package	1 cent.
4-ounce package	4 cents.
5-ounce package	12 cents.
5-ounce package (by mail sealed)	10 cents.
16-ounce package	12 cents.
17-ounce package	24 cents.
17 ounces divided into 4 packages of 4¼ ounces each	48 cents.
17 ounces divided into packages of 1 ounce each	17 cents.

When and how does this make the cost of living cheaper?

Legend to Tables No. 7 and No. 8.

In order to find the rates from New York to Pittsburgh, for instance, you must observe the numbers in which they fall, 17 and 19 in this case, and get their junction point thus: Follow 19, which is Pittsburgh, until you reach the junction with New York on the lower column, which is 17, and there you will find the figures 83, 46^2, and 43. The first is the parcel-post rate on 20 pounds of merchandise. The second is the express rate, while the superior figure 2 represents the zone that applies to the Kindel graduate. For table and rule, see Table 6. The last figure, 43, indicates the second or new Kindel method by which the railroads are paid 75 per cent instead of 50 per cent of the express rate, as now practiced by express companies, and to which is added the Burleson pick-up and delivery charge of 8 cents on 20 pounds. (See Table 3.) On 100 pounds the pick-up and delivery charge is 30 cents.

Summary of this table:

Parcel post		$74.82
Express	Merchandise	73.53
	Edibles	55.15

In my speech of August 5, 1914, I show the rates to 33 points, East and West, on 50 pounds, summarized as follows:

Parcel post		$1,736.37
	Edibles	939.56

The brackets inclosing figures in Table 8 are indicative of rates on 100 pounds of merchandise under the present schedule of parcel-post and express rates, in which cases parcel-post rates are from 100 to 150 per cent higher than the express rates, and on edibles the rates are still more, yet the Post Office Department would have the public believe that the parcel post is conducive to cheapen the cost of living.

Summary of this table:

Parcel post		$378.99
	Edibles	242.22

Note how our post office will carry 8 ounces of books from New York to San Francisco for 4 cents, but for 9 ounces of books it charges 12 cents; in other words, you must pay 8 cents for the additional ounce carried, while 1 ounce packages may be shipped for 1 cent. On an additional ounce above the pound you must pay 12 cents in each instance between the same points. Has there ever been so arbitrary and idiotic a tariff proposed or in use anywhere but in this great and glorious country of ours?

Here are additional examples that are convincing: The rate on "books," weighing 18 ounces, from New York to Salt Lake City is 24 cents. The same weight of books from New York to British Columbia or Australia would cost but 9 cents. A discrimination in favor of foreign countries. Why?

Another instance might be cited. A package of printed matter, weighing 3 pounds 3 ounces, from New York to Brooklyn would cost 26 cents postage. Taking the same package and adding 29 ounces, making a 5-pound parcel-post package, it can be shipped for 8 cents.

Also, a 5-ounce package of merchandise by parcel post from New York to Salt Lake City would cost 12 cents, while a 5-ounce package by letter postage and sealed would cost but 10 cents. Another discrimination is in force in favor of foreign countries as to the size of packages, which is 72 inches, for weight 11 pounds, while in the United States the same size limit of 72 inches is enforced on packages weighing 50 pounds. How is it possible to crowd 50 pounds into a 72-inch space? There are many commodities that it would be impossible to crowd the weight into such space without destroying the same.

HOW IT WORKS OUT.

DENVER, COLO.

Hon. GEORGE J. KINDEL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GEORGE: I read your last remarks anent parcel-post charges to Mexico and must congratulate you on your fine work. You have been dealing sledge-hammer blows at the incompetency and the inequitable charges—all more or less in the interests of railroads and express companies.

Let me give you a detail in my own experience. God only knows why photographs are not merchandise, but unless a package weighs 4 pounds we must send as "printed matter," and consequently when a package of photographs would ordinarily demand 15, 20, 25, or 30 cents (anything at all over 8 cents) we simply add boards and heavy cardboard, a piece of iron or a nail or two and bring the weight up to 4 pounds or over. Then it is carried for the lowest possible rate. Last week I had a package that weighed 3¼ pounds. The rate would be 32 cents, but by adding a few heavy cardboards I brought it up to 4 pounds and it went for 8 cents.

Can you beat it? The heavier the package the less it costs to ship.

Yours, truly,

C. A. NAST.

Notice how the rate advances 1 cent per pound between zones after second zone on the first pound, and then how the rate increases 19 cents on 10 pounds, 39 cents on 20 pounds, 59 cents on 30 pounds, 79 cents on 40 pounds, and 99 cents on 50 pounds, etc., instead of 1 cent per pound as in the first instance.

The 5, 15, 25, 35, and so on, figures in zone 1 column indicate what can be saved in reshipping 150 miles into the next zone after the second.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. I presume that I am entitled to the closing on this amendment, and I would like to have the gentleman use his time.

Mr. COX. I think not. I think the gentleman in charge of the bill is entitled to the closing. Mr. Chairman, who is entitled to close this argument, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] or the gentleman in charge of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman in charge of the bill has the right to close.

Mr. COX. There will be only one more speech on this side.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, on this proposition to drop the assistant postmasters there is this to be said, that the argument that it is in the interest of economy is not well founded. If you read the hearings upon that point, you will observe that it is impossible that it can be true that it saves anything at all, because it is claimed that the two thousand five hundred and odd assistant postmasters will occupy under the new law their positions without having their salaries reduced. Now, of course, to give the same men another title will not reduce their salary; there is no economy about that.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. The Postal Service is the only governmental service that does pay its way as it goes, anyhow, is it not?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly; I pointed that out some time ago. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], a member of the committee, has made some remarks here in regard to assistant postmasters and postmasters, and I think it has already been pointed out that he could not have had any experience on that point, because, residing in the city of Chicago, where there is only one postmaster and one assistant postmaster, his observation is limited. And I understood him to say that he withdrew that part of his remarks which reflected on the efficiency of the postmasters.

I have been in Congress for 12 years, and during the Roosevelt administration there were a great many vacancies in the second and third class offices in my district, and in every case of a reappointment the Postmaster General required a written promise on the part of the appointee to attend to the duties of his office personally. There are dozens of this kind of offices in my district, which is a very large one territorially, and with many small towns, and I know the postmasters have been efficient and not figureheads. I know that a great many of them now have been put out and good Democrats put in their places; but they also, so far as I know, are good men. And it is not correct to say that the postmaster is simply an ornamental official or that his position is that of a sinecure. On the contrary, as a general rule, he is a very active and efficient man, but it is impossible for him to attend to all the details or become so familiar with the technicalities of the service as an assistant who has served there for years and years. It is impossible for him to get in as close touch with the employees as the assistant postmaster, who has been there for a long time. You are destroying a class of very efficient officials by this indirect method.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] is recognized.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that about everything has been said on this subject that is worth saying. After hearing the gentleman from the city of Chicago [Mr. MADDEN] make his clear and explicit statement upon the proposition, there should not be any doubt entertained by any gentleman on that side of the aisle as to how he ought to vote. There is positively and emphatically no politics in the proposition under consideration; none whatever. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] said awhile ago, possibly there ought to be, but there is not.

There will not be an assistant postmaster displaced or thrown out of a job. While it is true that this proposition does propose to abolish his position or title, yet the man is already in the civil service, and will be taken care of in some place somewhere in the civil service and in the postal department. It comes down, therefore, to this side of the House as to whether or not we propose to back up the recommendation made by the Post Office Department. This is a recommendation that has been under process of investigation for quite a while, and I may add that the final conclusion arrived at in this recommendation was that of employees of the Post Office Department, about whose politics I do not know, nor do I care. I believe that the ultimate intention and effect of it is and will be, as the First Assistant Postmaster General well expressed it before the committee, the postmaster will move from the rear room of the post-office building to the front room, and will be made alone directly responsible for the work in his office.

Mr. Chairman, this proposition is in line with the policy of great business organizations. I am unable to conceive or comprehend a great business organization that does not have one man, and one man alone, as the man solely responsible for the conduct of the institution. Every time you divide responsibility you then and there weaken power. Every time you concentrate responsibility you increase the power.

Now, then, here is the assistant postmaster having charge of certain departments—just exactly what the function of the postmaster is I am not clear myself, and I do not quite agree with some of the statements that have been made on the floor of the House, that it has heretofore been a sinecure—but we do know, and that knowledge is plain to all of us, that the assistant postmasters are the men who have heretofore had the responsibility of conducting the post offices. As the assistant postmasters have been largely responsible for the conduct of the offices, and as the postmasters are drawing the salaries of their offices, move the postmaster forward and make him, and him alone, responsible. I have no doubt in my mind at all that if the position of assistant postmaster is abolished the postmaster himself will be interested in surrounding himself with the most competent and able help that he can possibly surround himself with, and that when he comes to select his superintendent of finance or his superintendent of mails he will put the assistant postmaster in one of those places, and that will take care of him.

Now, to repeat, there is no politics in this. No man should consider politics for a moment when he comes to vote upon that question. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says, it is a tremendous business proposition whether or not we are going to follow along lines of great business institutions and make the postmaster alone responsible for the conduct of his office.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be voted down. I call for a vote.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of so much importance that I think we ought to have a quorum, and therefore I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-seven gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FERRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19906), finding itself without a quorum, he ordered the roll to be called, whereupon 196 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. A quorum being present, the committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the amendment be reported again. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 8, on page 5, insert the following:

"For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, 5, at not exceeding $4,000 each; 42 at not exceeding $3,000 each; 10 at not exceeding $2,500 each; 5 at not exceeding $2,000 each; 16 at not exceeding $1,900 each; 45 at not exceeding $1,800 each; 95 at not exceeding $1,700 each; 150 at not exceeding $1,600 each; 180 at not exceeding $1,500 each; 150 at not exceeding $1,400 each; 350 at not exceeding $1,300 each; 560 at not exceeding $1,200 each; 525 at not exceeding $1,100 each; 300 at not exceeding $1,000 each; 130 at not exceeding $900 each; 100 at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $3,200,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BROWNING) there were—ayes 56, noes 61.

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. STEENERSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. MOON and Mr. STEENERSON.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 67.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the respective compensation of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof to the First Assistant Postmaster General, for the calendar year immediately preceding the adjustment, at the following rates, namely:

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the Clerk should complete the reading of the list of salaries as one paragraph.

Mr. CULLOP. If no right will be waived by the reading, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. No rights will be lost.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. How far is it understood that the Clerk is to read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the Clerk should read down to the end of the list of postmasters and salaries.

Mr. MANN. That will be down to what point?

The CHAIRMAN. Down to line 14, on page 7.

Mr. HOWARD. And at that time the Chair will entertain a point of order against the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

At each post office where the receipts are $8,000 and less than $20,000, $2,000.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I want to make a point of order against that item. Is it proper to make it now or shall I wait?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the Clerk should finish the reading of the list.

Mr. WINGO. That applies to points of order and amendments also?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. WINGO. Is each paragraph a section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that down to the end of line 14, on page 7, which recites the list of offices, should be treated as one paragraph for the purpose of reading it.

The Clerk read as follows:

At each post office where the receipts are $13,600,000 and over, $8,000.

Mr. CULLOP, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. WINGO rose.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that entire paragraph on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill and a change of existing law. Further than that, Mr. Chairman, as I understood it, it was admitted here on the floor of the House the other day by members of the Rules Committee when they brought in the second rule that three items in this bill, that were included in the first rule that was voted down by the House, would be subject to a point of order. That statement was made, as I remember it, by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and this was one of the items that was excluded from the second rule. But whether that be true or not, it is subject to a point of order, in that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and that it changes existing law and it does not affirmatively appear to reduce expenses.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CULLOP. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] has made a point of order against the entire paragraph as a whole, because it is new legislation and is subject to a point of order, as he understands it from the discussion that occurred the other day. Now, if that point of order should be overruled to the paragraph as a whole, could a point of order be made then against each item in the paragraph? I desire to make a point of order against each item separately in the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to be heard. Let us first dispose of the point of order of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. MANN. The point of order against the entire paragraph includes every item in it.

Mr. FOSTER. All these items were read as one paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. So that if the point of order is not held good——

Mr. MANN. If it is not held good, then everything in it escapes the point of order, because if there is any one thing in it that is subject to a point of order, it takes out the whole paragraph.

Mr. CULLOP. If that is the rule——

Mr. MANN. That is the rule.

Mr. CULLOP. Then I do not desire to press my point at this time.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, of course I want to be fair with the House about this matter. I understand that the point of order is to the proviso only. Am I correct about that?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made to the entire paragraph.

Mr. MOON. I insist that it is not good to the item of compensation of postmasters, $30,750,000. Does the gentleman make a point of order on that?

Mr. HOWARD. I made the point of order from line 9, on page 5, down to and including line 14, on page 7.

Mr. MOON. Then I understand the point of order is made against the proviso?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Beginning at line 9, on page 5?

Mr. MANN. The whole thing.

Mr. MOON. There is no point of order on the compensation of postmasters, $30,750,000. That has passed the committee. We have passed it all except the proviso.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the rule was defeated the first time in the House, and afterwards brought back and passed, and this provision was not included in the rule as it was returned to the House; and it is but fair to say to the committee that I am not going to insist upon that part of the proviso to this bill, because it was the understanding of the House that it was to be eliminated, although, of course, that understanding was only inferential; because if the matter in the bill was not subject to a point of order, then the rule could not make it in order, or have any effect on it at all. The question here now is whether, as a whole, it is subject to the point of order.

It is true that there has been a rearrangement of salaries under this bill. Now, six or eight of these sections do change the amounts upon which the salary is based. But the aggregate of the section, including the proviso, is $30,750,000, and that is the exact sum appropriated for the last time. The bill carries exactly the same figures it carried in the last year's bill. If the Chair should be of the opinion in making up the details of the aggregate sum that because these figures are assigned to different classes of offices it falls within the objection, I shall not insist, because of the alleged understanding in the House.

I want to say to the House that it would be an error and an unwise thing, even if this was subject to a point of order, to make it. With all due respect to every man who thinks otherwise, I think it would be foolish to make it, because you leave the section with the appropriation of $30,750,000 in a lump sum without any segregation or direction to the Post Office Department about the expenditure.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Do I understand that the compensation is fixed by law or by Executive order?

Mr. MOON. It is fixed by an annual law; that is all. Take, for instance, the question of allowing 18 salaries of $2,100, 24 salaries of $2,700, and that is exactly the law to-day. That is where it applies to third-class post offices.

Mr. BORLAND. That is not fixed by law but is carried in the annual appropriation bill?

Mr. MOON. In the annual appropriation bill; yes. I want the House to understand that I am not objecting if you want it that way. Without any segregation it will be a splendid thing for the department to let them handle it and have their own way about it.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. Does not the law provide now for the salaries of postmasters; that is, the salary which postmasters shall receive at the respective offices?

Mr. MOON. Yes; in certain classes it does.

Mr. TAGGART. The lump sum will be distributed in accordance with the law if the proviso is stricken out?

Mr. MOON. Possibly; but it is an annual law and not binding.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to say that it would be unwise to make the appropriation without specifying how it shall be distributed.

Mr. MOON. I do not know that I ought to go that far, but I think it would be wiser to let it stand.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to ask the gentleman if it had ever been distributed in any prior Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MOON. Yes; there was a time when we appropriated it in a lump sum.

Mr. MANN. It has not been distributed in a bill since the gentleman and I have been Members of the House.

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes; the segregation of the items, and most items under the bill occurred for the first time when Mr. Loud, of California, was chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Not fixing the salaries of postmasters. The item for years has been carried "For compensation of postmasters" so much money, and that is the end of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wants to ask the gentleman from Tennessee this question. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that this is legislation and is not in order on an appropriation bill. That is not quite sufficient. Legislation may be in order under certain conditions.

Mr. MOON. Yes; under the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to inquire of the chairman of the committee, who is more familiar with this matter, being first satisfied of the germaneness of the proviso and that it does not reduce the number of offices—the Chair wishes to ask the gentleman if it is a retrenchment of expenditure?

Mr. MOON. I understand from the department that it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman assert that the item shows on its face that it reduces the number of offices or retrenches expenditure?

Mr. MOON. I will explain it in a moment. This act is applicable to third-class post offices, and it retains every office on the existing salary grade in accordance with the gross receipts requiring the proposed salary. It is identical in the third-class offices with the salary now provided for third-class offices under the general and annual law.

In second-class post offices heretofore the existing grade of salary in the office of $2,000 where the receipts were under $8,000, and in the proposed plan it is $2,000 where the receipts are the same. However, in the $9,000 gross receipts the salary was $2,100, and in the $10,000 grade it was $2,200, and the $11,000 gross receipts $2,300, and $13,000 gross receipts $2,400. Now this law drops out these four classes and comes down to the $20,000 proposition, where $2,500 is given when the receipts are as high as $20,000. Under the old plan it was $16,000. Therefore you save a salary of $100 on the second, the third, the fourth, and the fifth of that class of second-class post offices. Then you wipe out all of the intermediary salaries of $2,600, $2,700, $2,800, $2,900, down to where the receipts are $40,000 in the first class. There you have $3,000 salary for $40,000 gross receipts, and $3,000 under the proposed plan. Then you drop out the intermediary salary until the first-class offices yield $160,000, and you fix the salary at $3,500. These intermediate salaries between $2,500 and $3,500 are dropped out, and so on until you complete the list, the largest saving being in the large offices, where are the largest receipts.

It would seem on its face that in the proposition, compared with existing law, there was a saving of about $3,000,000 in money. But, as I remarked before, I do not want the House to be misguided by what I have said; the real saving will be about $300,000 or a little over, because the difference between that sum and the $3,000,000 will be used for the purpose of employing superintendents of finances of railway mail. I think on the face of the section it shows a saving of $3,200,000. Again, it is fair to say that that is not the real saving, because we have had in other branches salaries of officers that will take up that sum with the exception of about $300,000.

But I am not going to press on this House, if it does not want it, the consideration of this question. I am not going to insist it is in order, although I think it is, under the Holman rule, in view of the fact that so many Members of the House thought there was a consent agreement that this matter should go out in the event that rule was passed the second time. I am not going to put myself in the attitude of betraying any feeling on that score.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. In the proviso here is not this a new method of ascertaining the amount to be paid to the postmasters?

Mr. MOON. I might have said that.

Mr. HOWARD. That they are to be graded in even hundreds?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. And payable in quarterly payments?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. To be ascertained by the Postmaster General from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor of the Post Office Department?

Mr. MOON. The exact language is different. The gentleman is right about that. I am not going to insist that part of the section or the body of the proviso is in the language of the old law. I am going to say right now, for the satisfaction of the gentleman and everyone else, that I am entirely willing, as the department is, that this be left just exactly as you leave it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If this is a new method of determining the salaries, does that or does it not take it out of the Holman rule?

Mr. MOON. I think so. That is what I said a moment ago, that so far as the body of the proviso is concerned it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So that the Holman rule not being applicable this particular point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia is well taken?

Mr. MOON. I had hoped that the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Georgia would understand me. I have said that so far as the aggregate sum was concerned there is a large saving to the Government in the amount of the appropriation, but the phraseology of the body of the proviso is different from that carried heretofore, and it might properly be said to be new law. I am not going to insist, as I said before, upon the House adopting this recommendation of the department, as wise as I think it is, in view of what occurred in the consideration of the rule. I think the department will be left with this appropriation to do as it pleases.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to call the attention of the Chair to the rule as offered on the 19th day of December. It does not include the $30,000,000 item to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] referred a moment ago.

Mr. MOON. The first rule did.

Mr. CULLOP. I have the one of December 19. It begins just with the proviso, and it covers the other items in the bill, and therefore the item of $30,000,000——

Mr. MOON. That is not in dispute——

Mr. CULLOP. I understand that, but the gentleman from Tennessee referred to that as if this were connected with it.

Mr. MOON. This is the proviso to that.

Mr. CULLOP. I understand that, and that is what I am trying to get the gentleman from Tennessee to understand, so that this has no application or connection with the $30,000,000 item, but is separate from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that the existence of a rule or the particular thing that it does or does not embody has anything to do with this proposition. The proposition here is a cold one and comes to the Chair in that attitude, irrespective of what he may or may not believe about the matter. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] makes the point of order that this is new legislation on a pending appropriation bill. That, standing alone, would not eliminate this item; that, standing alone, would not strike it from the appropriation bill, even though it be legislation. The question the Chair must determine is, first, Is the language under consideration germane? The Chair is not in doubt on this point, and thinks it is. The next thing that the Chair must decide for himself is, Does it retrench expenditures? and, third, Does it show on its face that it does? The Chair is rather of the opinion that it does retrench expenditures, but the Chair is not very clear whether it so shows it on its face or not.

Mr. STEENERSON. The existing law provides for exactly the same amount of appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not necessarily determine the matter. Lump-sum appropriations are often made, and might or might not be used. That would not necessarily foreclose the item under the rule. Any excess there may be in any lump-sum appropriation would be properly covered back into the Treasury, and that might not conclude the question.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. As I understand it, some of these items in the proviso are exactly the same as the items provided for in the present law. Some of the other items are different. As to whether they are greater or less, no one has shown any evidence whatsoever. Is it the duty of the Chair to secure the statute and compare it item by item and determine whether or not, as a matter of fact, it does retrench expenditures, or is it the duty of the Chair to pass upon the very face of it?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Kansas allow me a word? I cited to the Chair the present law of the land. The Chair, of course, can compare the bill with the law of the land and determine whether it appears upon its face that it retrenches expenditures.

Mr. TAGGART. Very true; but this bill carries the same number of items, the same amount of money, but different distributions. Has the gentleman shown the Chair that on its face it retrenches expenditures?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I wish the Chair would indulge me for a moment. I do not think the Chair caught fully the point of order I made. The Chair has stated only a portion of it. When I made the point of order, and I think the reporter's notes will bear me out, I made the point of order that this was new legislation; in other words, it was legislation on an appropriation bill. Further, that it did not affirmatively appear that it reduced expenses, and it is obliged to appear affirmatively, as an amendment to come within the Holman rule, that it is a retrenchment, and the failure to affirmatively appear would make it subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has considered the point of order in the light of the gentleman's more recent statement. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard? The Chair is in doubt as to whether or not the provision shows on its face that it really works a retrenchment.

Mr. MANN. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I have not heard a statement as to whether any of the items in this increase the pay of postmasters according to the receipts. We have had a statement that some of the items would be the same and in some cases there would be a decrease. Now, whether there are any increases, I think, is a very pertinent inquiry. If there were increases in some cases and decreases in other cases, I do not see how the Chair could determine in advance of the settlement of the question and the sale of postage stamps whether the decreases would more than balance the increases or vice versa.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman will look on page 42 of the hearings, he will find a statement in reference to all classes of offices——

Mr. MANN. It is pretty late for us to examine into that——

Mr. MOON (continuing). And unless this section is passed then the appropriation will have to be increased over the former appropriation about $1,500,000.

Mr. MANN. I am told the hearings state that there are no increases. Several gentlemen here have informed me as to offices with which they are familiar that there are increases.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield? I want to call the attention of the gentleman to two of the larger cities in my State wherein one is decreased, the city of Omaha, and the city of Lincoln is increased under this classification.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It ought to be.

Mr. SLOAN. And that arises from the peculiar classification. Lincoln at present has a $3,900 salary by reason of its having between $400,000 and $450,000 receipts. It would have $4,000 under the classification proposed in this bill, being between $340,000 and $610,000. So here is an increase in one case and a decrease in another from the present law, the decrease being in the Omaha office from $6,000 under the present law to $5,000 under the proposed law. The fact that Lincoln is the home of our Secretary of State and Omaha the residence of Senator HITCHCOCK is regarded as a mere accident of classification, and the fact that Lincoln has a new Democratic postmaster while Omaha has a Republican postmaster with some time to serve is of no more than incidental significance.

Mr. MANN. I did not know what the facts were; I have not seen any general statement.

Mr. MOON. What does the gentleman say about there being an increase?

Mr. SLOAN. In the city of Lincoln.

Mr. MOON. How much?

Mr. SLOAN. One hundred dollars.

Mr. MOON. In what office?

Mr. SLOAN. In the city of Lincoln, Nebr.

Mr. MOON. Upon what basis?

Mr. SLOAN. The present salary is $3,900, and it is based upon receipts as given here under the rules and regulations, being between $400,000 and $450,000. Now, under the new classification Lincoln will fall between the $340,000, as you will find at the bottom of page 6, and $610,000, carrying a salary of $4,000, or an increase of $100.

Mr. MOON. It is possible in this classification in some one office——

Mr. SLOAN. It is not only possible but certain.

Mr. MOON. Oh, but taking it clear through——

Mr. MANN. Several other gentlemen here have stated there were increases, and I simply wish to ask——

Mr. MOON. The gentleman may be right about it, because $3,900 was the salary when it was $400,000 receipts, and now it is only $4,000 when the receipts are $610,000.

Mr. MANN. Showing there is an increase, and how can the Chair determine how many increases will be made?

Mr. MOON. Oh, but the Chair is not to take all possible increases—there is no showing here upon the face of this bill that there is any such office.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; there is no showing anything on the face of it that——

Mr. MOON. The difference is when you drop out four classes with heavy salaries you bring them down to a $4,000 salary when you get them to $340,000 receipts and between that and $610,000 receipts.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield further? I inquired of the Post Office Department about the correctness of this and was informed from the First Assistant Postmaster General's office that there was an increase of the postmaster's salary in the Lincoln post office.

The Post Office bill now under discussion provides for a general reclassification of postmasters' salaries. The apparent purpose in the reclassification is to reduce the salaries generally of postmasters in second-class offices and to increase, or at least protect, the salaries in certain first-class offices of the first metropolitan grades.

In the first-class offices, under the present law, there are but five paying more than $6,000, namely, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis. The salary of each of these is now $8,000. Kansas City, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Minneapolis, and many others will remain the same as heretofore.

There are a good many reductions in first-class offices where the pay has heretofore been $3,100 or $3,200 to $3,000. There is a large number of second-class offices where the salaries are reduced from a sum under $3,000 to $2,500, and a larger number from $2,500 and under to $2,000.

These reductions fall most heavily and frequently upon the thriving county seat and other towns where the population ranges from 2,000 to 15,000 inhabitants. However, salaries are based on post-office receipts.

The effect of this bill in these particulars is especially marked in my congressional district and State of Nebraska.

The following shows how it affects Nebraska:

It works a reduction in 33 Nebraska post offices in the aggregate annual amount of $8,700.

It works an increase in 1 office in the sum of $100.

The changes in congressional districts are as follows:

	Decrease.
First district.
Falls City	$400
Lincoln (increase)	100
Nebraska City	500
Plattsmouth	100
Net decrease for district	900
Second district.
Blair	$100
Omaha	1,000
Decrease for district	1,100
Third district.
Albion	$100
Central City	300
Columbus	500
Fremont	100
Norfolk	200
Schuyler	100
Wayne	200
Total decrease for district	1,500
Fourth district.
Aurora	$300
Crete	300
David City	300
Fairbury	500
Seward	200
Wahoo	200
York	200
Total decrease for district	2,000
Fifth district.
Clay Center	$100
Superior	300
Grand Island	100
Holdrege	300
McCook	200
Total decrease for district	1,000
Sixth district.
Alliance	$400
Broken Bow	300
Chadron	100
Crawford	100
Kearney	100
Lexington	200
North Platte	500
O'Neill	100
Scotts Bluff	300
Total decrease for district	2,100

It will be seen that Nebraska, as a strictly agricultural State, would lose to its postmasters a net sum of $8,600. It would be little comfort to know that a part of this saving would go to metropolitan cities. This is merely a metropolitan grab, which should not be permitted to pass. It is proper to state that this was one of the measures sought to be slipped through the House under the same unwarranted rule which attempted to crowd the contract system upon the Rural Free Delivery Service of this country; and it was sought to be done in such a way that if these two measures were not accepted, then the necessary funds for running the postal business of the country would be shut off. Many of the post offices affected by the above condition are presided over by Republicans now, but will be officered by Democrats under this proposed system; but they are entitled to be defended against this discrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit me to ask a question of the gentleman from Tennessee before he rules?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee state whether in the aggregate he can tell that there is an increase or a decrease?

Mr. MOON. In the aggregate there is a decrease of over $3,000,000.

Mr. MOORE. I listened to what the gentleman from Nebraska said about the increase at Lincoln, and I have been informed over the telephone from the Post Office Department that the salary at Philadelphia would be decreased.

Mr. MOON. I am not claiming they are increased. I am claiming they are decreased in these larger offices. That is why it falls under the Holman rule.

Mr. COX. The Chair has held the proviso is germane under the Holman rule. The question, then, as the Chair tersely put it, is, Does it retrench or reduce expenditures? I do not believe any direct evidence has been brought to the attention of the Chair showing that the proposed classification does reduce or retrench expenditures.

I doubt whether any positive evidence can be brought to you upon that point, but I believe evidence can be brought that the Chair, sitting as a court, judicially knows to be true, showing and intending to show that the proviso does reduce or retrench expenditures.

Now, the amount carried in this appropriation bill for salaries of postmasters for the next fiscal year is $30,750,000. That is the same amount that is carried in the current law for the present year. Now, then, the Chair, sitting as a court and as a legislator, knows that the Post Office Department has in all of its branches every year a constant and continuous increase in everything relating to the postmaster's salary as well as everything else. If the Chair will bear with me, I believe I can show him where, at least inferentially, that proviso tends to reduce and retrench expenditures, and therefore is in order under the Holman rule. I call the Chair's attention to the hearings on page 41:

> The average increase of postmasters' salaries during the last 10 years has amounted to $768,086.54, or 3.01 per cent.

Now, that has been the average increase in the salary of postmasters for the last 10 years.

> The average increase for the last five years amounts to $678,167.38, which is equivalent to 2.43 per cent. Now, taking 2.43 per cent, or 2.5 per cent, as the increment of increase, we would increase the estimate for 1915 by $748,855.23. By putting this average increase at 1.80 per cent, which is about the increase between 1912 and 1913, and using that as our basis, we found that the increase would be estimated at $552,655.16, and adding that to the estimated amount for 1915, in which year we are now, we have the figures which I first gave you, namely, $31,255,719.67, necessary in the event our proposed legislation is not approved.

Now, the bare fact that the appropriation for the next ensuing year carries the same amount that is found in the current law with the average increase of the salary of postmasters for the last 10 years—3.8 per cent—in my judgment, the Chair judicially knows that if this classification did not decrease the salary of the postmasters, instead of this amount being $30,755,000 there would have to be at least 3 per cent added onto it in order to meet the salary for the postmasters for the next year under the present current law, or under the law of the land. I say it can be figured out. While it is not shown upon its face that it is a decrease, yet when you apply the figures to the solution of the problem it figures out automatically that there must inevitably be a decrease in this appropriation.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. HOWARD. I notice the statement upon which you predicate these salaries is this tabulated statement of the First Assistant Postmaster General, and it says that under the present law a $4,000 salary is paid to a postmaster who had receipts in his office amounting to $450,000. Now, then, under the proposed plan you intend to pay him $4,000 in the event his receipts are $340,000. Therefore at that rate of salary you raise the salary of the postmasters.

Mr. COX. That might be true in certain circumstances. They might be increased in certain circumstances, but in the last analysis, or as a final result, it is irresistible that it resolves itself into a reduction instead of an increase.

Mr. HOWARD. If it reduces the expenses, why was it necessary for the Post Office Committee in this bill to carry identically the same appropriation as in 1914?

Mr. COX. Because there has been an increase of postmasters in the United States since the last bill was made up.

Mr. HOWARD. That does not affirmatively appear.

Mr. COX. I said to the chairman a while ago that while there was nothing on the bill that made it affirmatively appear, when you applied the figures to the case it brought it under the Holman rule.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to make this brief observation, that when the gentleman says there is nothing on the face of the record to show a decrease, he admits himself out of court, to use his own illustration. If the bill itself shows upon its face that there is no reduction, it is not within the Holman rule, and we can not, dehors the record, introduce evidence to contradict that record. The point is that the amount carried in the bill itself must be below that which is now appropriated, and it must affirmatively appear that the bill does reduce the sum heretofore appropriated, or the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the learned gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is usually right upon any proposition. He is hardly right that we go dehors the record in the House.

The Chair is called upon always in ruling to ascertain facts, because upon facts depends the ruling, and it is a most common practice for the Chair to ask the chairman of a committee in charge of a bill whether a certain thing accomplishes a certain purpose and does a certain thing outside of the record, and it must be so.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I was going to observe that the Chair has already held that the amendment is germane, and that being so, of course the position of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is not tenable, as explained by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

In order for you to determine whether or not upon the face of the bill there is a reduction of expenditures you have got to have something to compare the face of that bill with. It would be ridiculous for you to say that upon the face of it it decreases or increases expenses unless there is some other thing that it could be compared with in order to determine that reduction of expenditure, and the law of the land is the thing to compare it with.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me a word?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman evidently misunderstood me. I did not say there should be no comparison, but I said that the comparison should be of the pending bill with the existing law.

Mr. MOON. That is correct. I did not understand that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is my position.

Mr. MOON. Now, if that position is taken, a reduction of over $3,000,000 is shown.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] makes a point of order against the paragraph. Of course the general rule is that legislation can not be placed upon an appropriation bill. It is only to be retained, if at all, under the Holman rule. It can not come within the terms of that rule unless, first, it retrenches expenditures; second, reduces the number of officers; third, reduces their salaries; fourth, it must show on its face; or, fifth, it must be germane. As to germaneness, the Chair is not in doubt. The amendment is germane. As to whether or not it retrenches expenditures, the Chair is in doubt. As to whether or not it reduces the number of officers, the Chair does not think he has occasion to determine it, because there is nothing on the face of the bill or asserted in the argument that shows that it does reduce the number of officers. The Chair feels that he ought to preserve the rules of the House, and ought not to depart from the plain provision of the rule on account of any special agreement or specific impressions that may be entertained to the effect that it tends to reduce the number of officers or reduce the amount of expenditures. But reading from page 5, line 9, and even allowing the mind to go outside of the face of the bill, it is not clear in the mind of the Chair, as a matter of fact, whether or not it in fact does decrease or retrench expenditures. But leaning back on the chairman of the committee and other members of the committee who feel that it would work a large reduction of expenditure, certainly there is nothing on the face of the bill that would clearly indicate to anyone that it would reduce or retrench expenditures. Certainly there is nothing that could be read in the text by either layman or expert, without making mathematical calculations which the Chair does not feel called upon to make, that would show retrenchment or reduction. Therefore the point of order is sustained, and the language is eliminated.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared a speech that I wished to deliver on this bill, and I now ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOON. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent to go back to line 8, on page 5, to the words "For compensation to postmasters, $30,750,000," and strike out "$30,750,000" and insert "$31,255,719.67," that amount being necessary now to pay the postmasters since the Chair has ruled out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent to return to page 5, line 8, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 17:
"Superintendents of finance, superintendents of mails, and superintendents of delivery, six at not exceeding $3,800 each."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the Chairman think that it should be read to the end of this provision for superintendents?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not clear that he would be right about it, but that has been the practice, the Chair thinks.

Mr. MANN. These are separate paragraphs, and they have always been considered separate.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If it is considered a separate paragraph, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] moves to strike out the last word on line 19, page 7.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The sum here indicated is $3,800. What is the compensation of these superintendents at the present time?

Mr. MOON. That is an increase.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Of how much?

Mr. MOON. I think about $400. I believe $3,200 was the highest pay heretofore. That would be an increase of $600.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Do I understand that after all the pleas we have heard for economy, and after attempting to abolish the office of assistant postmasters, now it is proposed to increase the salaries of these gentlemen in these six offices in great cities?

Mr. MOON. Yes; and I will tell you why that is proposed. We reduced the salary. We have stricken out the assistant-postmaster proposition. It is necessary in these six large cities that we should create a position similar to that of assistant postmaster—that is, the position of superintendent of finance—and give him pay on the basis that the assistant postmaster got. For instance, if the postmaster got in those big cities $8,000, the pay of the superintendent of finance in that place ought to be about $3,800.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then we have this situation, as I understand, that you are not going to decrease the compensation of these assistant postmasters.

Mr. MOON. Yes; we are going to do this——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And yet you are going to increase the six superintendents, and at the same time you say you are going to save money.

Mr. MOON. In the large cities this compensation was raised from $3,200 to $3,800 for the purpose of raising the salary of the man who will no longer be assistant postmaster, but superintendent of finance in that place.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What does the assistant get now?

Mr. MOON. About 50 per cent of the salary of the postmaster.

Mr. GOULDEN. In New York City $4,000.

Mr. MOON. So this is a slight reduction—$200. As assistant postmaster the man gets $4,000, and in this position he will get $3,800. We had to raise the salary of this position in order to make it commensurate.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You still have the position of superintendent of finance, have you not?

Mr. MOON. We have various superintendents of finance and superintendents of mails all over the country, but these are for the large cities.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not understand how it is that you increase the salaries of these offices if no such offices now exist.

Mr. MOON. We are creating the office of superintendent of finance. Do you want to make a point of order on that? If you do, go ahead and make it. It is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would make it quickly enough if it were subject to it, but it is not.

Mr. MOON. Of course it is.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The special rule makes it in order. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that these assistant postmasters all over the country have had their salaries taken away, and, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee, it is proposed to reduce their compensation when they are assigned new positions, if they ever are, and it was proposed a moment ago by the committee to reduce the compensation of the postmasters throughout the country, all in the sacred name of economy, but in the very next paragraph we find a proposition to increase the salaries of these superintendents in the great cities.

Mr. MOON. It is plain enough to anybody who understands the situation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Perhaps so.

Mr. MOON. And I will make it plain to you in a moment. These men are now getting $4,000. If in their new positions we reduced them to $3,200, it would not be sufficient compensation, so we raised it to $3,800. Now talk all the economy you want.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then the chairman of the committee contradicts himself, because he started out by saying this was an increase of $600.

Mr. MOON. Yes; from $3,200 to $3,800.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. As I said, in the sacred name of economy we find increases here, when we have had it preached to us that these smaller offices throughout the country must be abolished to save money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. We are practicing economy on the small offices, but we must increase the salaries of these offices in the large cities to offset any saving that may be made.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman does not understand the situation at all. In the first place the position of assistant postmaster has been done away with, and there has been a change from the five-division system to the two-division system, and one man has charge of all the finances and the other has charge of everything connected with the delivery of the mail, so that there are two men who occupy positions relative to that of assistant postmaster, on account of the growth of the work. In our office there were five men who were superintendents, and now they will have two men, and that is the condition in every big city. They have economized by reducing the number of offices and consolidating the work.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is going to affect the city of St. Louis, and you need not argue any further. I know you are in favor of it.

Mr. BORLAND. It is going to effect an economy there.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And yet the committee told the House that these assistant postmasters were not going to be put out of office, that they were going to give them other places; and now it is proposed to give increased salaries to these superintendents for doing the work of the assistants. Whose places will the assistants take?

Mr. BORLAND. They are going to give them other places.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And now you say that they are increasing the salaries because two men are to do the work of five.

Mr. BORLAND. Where there have been five offices there will now be two.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is an increase in these high-class offices. That is all, and it is done in the name of economy. Now, before I sit down I want to offer an amendment to reduce the salary to $3,200.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Washington is in error in this case, because in the Philadelphia post office they propose to reduce the postmaster's salary from $8,000 to $7,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a small office. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I was referring to the large offices, not to the Philadelphia class.

Mr. MOORE. Yes; like Seattle, Wash., and Lincoln, Nebr. [Laughter].

Mr. STEENERSON. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee where these six superintendents are located whose salaries are to be increased from $3,200 to $3,800? They are in New York and Chicago, are they not?

Mr. MADDEN. I can tell the gentleman. They are in Chicago and New York.

Mr. STEENERSON. I was asking the chairman.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman can answer as well as I can.

Mr. STEENERSON. I know where they are, but I was asking the chairman.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman ought not to take the time of the committee by asking me to answer something that he already knows. I ask the clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill unless some gentleman wants to offer an amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have offered an amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, and I propose to keep it until my time is out. So far as I have been able to learn, this proposition is the only one where salaries are actually increased. These supervisory officers throughout the country have their salaries increased.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I will not yield now. It seems to me strange that the high officials of the Post Office Department should deem it necessary to recommend an increase in the salaries of the supervisory officials when they recommend reductions of so sweeping character in the pay of carriers.

It seems to me that the fervent patriotism of these high officials who are in favor of reducing some one else's salary could be compared only to the patriotism of Artemus Ward, who was not willing to enlist in the war himself, but was willing to sacrifice all of his wife's relations on the altar of his country. That is the patriotism that we find in the proposition here in the recommendation to cut the poor rural carriers' pay and the smaller offices, while the high officials whose salaries are $3,200 shall be raised to $3,800. I believe they are entitled to it, but I do not think that they are in view of the fact that everybody else's salary is proposed to be reduced.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. What per cent of the entire revenue of the Post Office Department comes from the cities of Chicago and New York?

Mr. STEENERSON. None of it; I think it all comes from the country and flows into New York and Chicago. [Laughter.] Whatever postage you pay in the cities you charge back to the people who trade with you, so in the end it is the country that pays the whole bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. One-sixth of the entire revenue comes from those two cities.

Mr. STEENERSON. It depends on the way you figure it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, $52,000,000 of the receipts of the Post Office Department comes from the cities of New York and Chicago—one-sixth of all the revenue. The men who are provided for in this $3,800 item each have over 3,000 men under their jurisdiction. That is an army. And yet the gentleman who comes from a section of the country where they have not more than one man in any post office, the receipts of which are infinitesimal, objects to the employment of brains to run the great institutions of these great cities of America. We have only one man as postmaster in each of these great cities, but we employ an army of men under him to conduct the business, and this one superintendent is obliged to understand all the details, all the vast business done under his jurisdiction; but, according to the gentleman's idea, he must not be placed where his salary could be increased. This is equality of opportunity, according to the gentleman from Minnesota. That is equality of treatment. If there were ever men anywhere who have been unjustly and unfairly treated, it is the men who are provided for in the item now under consideration. That they have only been paid in the past $3,200 is to the shame of the Government; that they are only to be paid $3,800, if this bill becomes a law, is unfair, because no man who occupies one of these places should be employed at a smaller salary than $6,000; and no man who occupies such a place in the commercial life of America would be thought of at less than $10,000. Gentlemen say they want to be fair and want to be just, but there is no justice and no fairness in the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment to strike out the "$3,800" and insert "$3,200." I want to see who lines up for economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 18, strike out "$3,800" and insert "$3,200."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington) there were 4 ayes and 32 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

Superintendents of finance and superintendents of mails, six, at not exceeding $3,400 each.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Where is the compensation provided for in this case?

Mr. MOON. Wherever the Postmaster General sees fit to assign a superintendent.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is that an increase?

Mr. MOON. Yes; that is an increase.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am very much elated by the vote that was given me on my last amendment on that side of the House, and I am almost persuaded to offer another amendment.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman think he ought to be persuaded, considering the way his own side voted against him on his last amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Washington does not wear any medals for economy.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I never stood around and made a pretense; I was always consistent. I never tried to take anything away from anybody by an amendment under a sham and a pretense. I do not blame my friend from Chicago for wanting to get an increase there for two or three gentlemen in his post office. My distinguished friend from Illinois, Mr. MADDEN, made a plea for postmasters, and said they only had one at Chicago, but under the definition that he gave a while ago, that a postmaster was a politician, and the fact that they have 3,000,000 in that city qualified for the place, I think there will be no dearth of postmasters in that vicinity.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, what is before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington has moved to strike out the last word.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am surprised that the gentleman from Missouri could not discover so large a man so close to him; it shows that he does not see many things that he ought to. I just want to say this, since the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has come into the Chamber: I want to call his attention to the fact that the great Post Office Committee, that has been preaching economy to us and the whole country, now proposes to increase certain salaries. I would expect the gentleman from New York to protest. I just want to call his attention to it, because I know he will as soon as he sees the item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think the attitude of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] fully explains the erroneous notion that he and those who think like him have as to what is economy. It is not economy to refuse to pay a few men, a mere handful, compensation that may only be said to approximate what even in an economical government should be paid for services rendered. I saw the gentleman fussing here because $200 was proposed as an increase in the compensation of men——

Mr. MOON. Six men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Whose services are of such a character that anyone who has the slightest knowledge of them appreciates that they are worth more than it is now proposed to pay them. It is not economy to oppose every increase in salary. It is not economy to refuse to pay men an adequate compensation for services rendered. It is not economy to bite off your nose to spite your face in this House. I can recall when the gentleman from Washington still possessing these same notions of economy advocated very large expenditures to build roads and trails and shelters in certain national parks adjacent to the community in which he resides, not because the number of persons who visit the park justified very large expenditures of money, but because the proposed appropriation would put money in circulation in that particular portion of the country in which he resides, and would make more convenient, more pleasant and attractive some of the property of the Government to a very restricted number of people residing in a very restricted area, all of them represented in the House by the distinguished gentleman from Washington. I have never attempted to prevent an adequate compensation being paid Government officials for their services. I am one of those who believe first that the great bulk of Government employees are amply paid. I believe that the employees in the clerical forces of the United States Government are well paid. I know that in certain supervisory positions, certain technical positions, the employees of the Federal Government as a rule are not properly remunerated. It would be easy to provide proper remuneration for those employees if we could eliminate certain unnecessary officials, curtail certain activities of the Government which properly should not be conducted by the Federal Government. The gentleman from Washington strongly opposes the abolition of assistant postmasters, because some particular individual would lose some particular place, although he would not be separated from the public service. He would lose a title, although there would be greatly increased efficiency and resultant economy. He opposes that reform because some one in whom he is interested might lose a title—not his compensation, not work, just a title, a title obtained by having been assigned to a place which he obtained, as in most of these cases, without civil service examination. Yet the gentleman cries out for economy and antagonizes an increase of a few hundred dollars to pay some of the hardest worked and most deserving men in the whole public service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Superintendents of finance, and superintendents of mails, 16 at not exceeding $3,200 each.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Since the gentleman from New York has seen fit to point out some of my economies, I think it would be well to point out a few that he has practiced. I recall that last year we of the west coast made a very strenuous effort to get $40,000 for a wire drag to locate the dangerous rocks in the waters of the coast of Alaska. Along that coast since it has become an American possession we have lost over 280 vessels. We have lost over $12,000,000 worth of property. We have lost over 400 lives. Last year 43,000 passengers went through those dangerous waters. Last year our trade with Alaska amounted to $67,000,000. During the last four years the Government has lost vessels to the value of $850,000 in those waters. We went before the Committee on Appropriations and urged $40,000 to survey those waters, to protect life and property. That was denied in the holy name of economy, but in the same bill where the $40,000 was denied to protect life and property in the most dangerous waters upon the face of the earth $50,000 was appropriated to erect a monument to the memory of some man whose name I can not now recall and whose name two-thirds of the people of the United States never heard. In that same bill where they refused to appropriate $40,000 for a survey of these waters, when the emergency was so great that the Secretary of Commerce made a personal appeal that it be done, and when the President of the United States had asked that it be done, the pitiful sum of $40,000 was refused with which to protect $67,000,000 of commerce and 43,000 lives—refused upon the pitiful plea of economy.

But in the same bill where this appropriation was asked $400,000 was appropriated to purchase an additional site for a public building in Richmond, Va. That is the gentleman's idea of economy and emergency. I will put my attitude upon economy against that of the gentleman. If what I said, when that bill comes in this time, will induce the gentleman to follow the recommendation of the President and Secretary of Commerce and appropriate this needed money, I will forgive him for everything he has said about me and everything he may say. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). In the first place the President made no such recommendation——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, well, the gentleman ought to read what the President said in his message.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Until the opening session of this Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So that there was no refusal to follow the recommendation of the President. And in the second place——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, to whom had I yielded?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I did not want to yield to the gentleman just now. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the second place the gentleman's party was in control of the Federal Government for 16 years——

Mr. MANN. The same old 16 years again.

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). And the gentleman himself was in this House for a good many years. He is living as close to Alaska as anybody in the United States, and he never knew of the necessity or of the desirability of having this so-called wire dredge in order to locate dangerous rocks in the uncertain waters of Alaska until a Democratic Secretary of Commerce, living in the city of New York, urged Congress to make the appropriation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I lived as close to Alaska as the gentleman from Washington does and I had to wait until somebody 4,000 miles away discovered what it was thought desirable to have in order to protect commerce, life, and property in those waters, I would either do a little more investigating on my own account, or I would allow some one with more activity and knowledge about matters to represent that section of the country in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that while that is a very brilliant remark he made about me, the only trouble is it is not correct——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is correct. The gentleman never opened his mouth about a wire dredge for Alaskan waters until a Democratic Secretary of Commerce had recommended——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this discussion is not confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will look in his files he will find the letter I wrote to him upon the question, and to every Member of Congress I sent a similar letter. The trouble about it is that the gentleman does not remember the facts and he does not correctly state them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I did not remember the facts from my experience with the gentleman from Washington, I would not appeal to him to ascertain and know the facts.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman would not accept them in any event.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman if he discovered in this connection, in reference to this wire drag of the Secretary of Commerce, who has a drag with the present administration?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. We will know when the appropriation bill comes in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We know very well the gentleman from Washington has not and does not deserve it, and I hope he will not have it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Superintendents of finance, cashiers, bookkeepers, superintendents of mails, assistant superintendents of mails, superintendents of stations, foremen, special clerks, and stenographers, 150 at not exceeding $1,800 each.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I dislike to renew this controversy, but I will use but a minute. I simply want to state, in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], if he has not left the floor——

Mr. MOON. I suggest that the gentleman from Washington had better wait until the gentleman from New York comes back.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will not take but a minute.

Mr. MOON. It is not on the Post Office bill, anyway.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will get through in a minute. The statement of the gentleman from New York, as I said, was very facetious as to what had been done, but, as a matter of fact, if the gentleman will look in his files he will find that long before the appropriation bill came in last year I wrote him a letter, and that letter sets out in detail the wrecks that have taken place in Alaskan waters and the great necessity for these appropriations. I not only wrote to the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, but I wrote a letter of a similar character to every Member of both the House and the Senate. I did everything within my power to secure this appropriation for a survey of Alaskan waters, and while I do not claim to know everything about the needs of my country, in this particular instance, at least, I am not subject to the criticism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say that that was after the Secretary of Commerce had made his recommendation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You are mistaken about that again.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not mistaken about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Superintendents of finance, superintendents of mails, superintendents of stations, foremen, special clerks, and stenographers, 2,700, at not exceeding $1,300 each.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 4, insert the following:
"Provided, That in the appointment of superintendents of finance, superintendents of mails, superintendents of delivery, auditors, cashiers, or their assistants, such appointments shall be made, so far as may be, from assistant postmasters now serving, and in the offices where now serving, when otherwise qualified."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order before the Chair rules.

Mr. MOON. And I insist that the argument shall be on the point of order only.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, the point of order is well taken. The provisions for these superintendents are only made in order by reason of the rule. The amendment which I have offered pertains only to these superintendents. Certainly it will be perfectly proper to offer it as an amendment to each one individually, and if to each individually it is proper, it can be offered to all of them en gross, and it applies only to all of them en gross. All of it, of course, is new legislation. All of it is made in order only under the rule, and this is an amendment to that which is made in order under the rule. It seems to me there can be no question about the amendment being in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is clearly new legislation, and is not in order under the rules of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course there is no doubt about it at all.

Mr. MANN. Of course there is no doubt about its being legislation. The rule under which we are operating provides that after the adoption of the rule it shall be in order in the consideration of the Post Office bill, and so forth, to consider new legislation in each and all the sections of the said bill, notwithstanding the rules of the House, as follows, to wit, and then follows the items in regard to superintendents, commencing on page 7, line 15, down to and including page 10, line 4. The Chair has the rule before him. All of this is treated by the rule as legislation and made in order, and if it had not been in order the point of order would probably have been made to the very first item of all of these provisions that have been read. But they were all subject to a point of order, because they were legislation. Now, the only question, I think, for the Chair to determine now is whether this amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is a germane amendment, because it is legislation offered to new legislation in the bill; and if it is a germane amendment it is in order, because the whole thing is legislation. Now, the provision in the bill which has been made in order under the rule provides for superintendents, not now authorized by law, as new legislation. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment to that, which certainly relates to it, providing a method of appointment of some of these superintendents. I was sure the Chair had not in mind the fact that this was all made in order as new legislation by the rule, or I would not have interrupted him.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman, I think, is mistaken on that.

Mr. MANN. It is made in order by the special rule of the House, and this was matter subject to a point of order under the rules of the House.

Mr. MOON. If it is new legislation, it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. This was not subject to the rules of the House, so far as legislation is concerned, because the rules of the House have been set aside by authorizing these matters as new legislation upon this bill. Of course, the other rules of the House apply——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that this course of reasoning should be applied to the question. The language in the bill, on page 10, as it appears, is of course legislation. Under the general rules of the House it would not be in order, but could be stricken out on a point of order, and in the absence of the special rule adopted, is clearly subject to a point of order.

But we are confronted with the special rule that has been offered in this House and adopted, which provides that certain legislation should be in order, the rules of the House notwithstanding. The Chair thinks that that rule should be construed strictly. The Chair thinks that that rule carries with it only what it has within its covers and within its terms, and the Chair thinks that to open the way to all classes of legislation under the rule making certain specific items of legislation in order would open it to indefinite amendment wholly outside of the rules of the House, and the committee would thereby go much further than the House ever intended it should go under the rule. The Chair therefore thinks that the point of order interposed by the chairman of the committee [Mr. MOON] is well taken, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the query of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the Chair also hold that no amendment to this proposition can be offered; that only the proposition reported in the rule, and nothing else, can be offered; and that it can not be perfected in any way?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that the rule adopted by this House on a record vote took those specified amendments out of the ordinary rules of the House and was an extraordinary remedy supplied, and that it made in order certain specified things. The Chair may be in error about it, but the Chair thinks its ruling will be that that rule should be strictly construed, and that, because one or more specified items of legislation are made in order, that does not admit new and outside propositions not contained in the special rule or permitted under the rules of the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. What is the object of reading the bill if it is not for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks that is a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] appeals from the ruling of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair be sustained?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the Chair would want to modify his ruling upon reflection, whatever should become of the amendment, it is so perfectly patent that the Chair is wrong in his opinion——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order for the gentleman to discuss the motion of appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois ask to be heard?

Mr. MANN. No. I have the right under the rules to discuss the appeal. The gentleman from Tennessee knows no more about the rules than he does about his bill, and that is not saying much. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON. If he only knew that, he would know more than the gentleman from Illinois, who does not know anything about the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Now, the rule that was adopted provides that it shall be in order to consider all the new legislation in the bill. It is not in order to agree to it, not in order to adopt it, but in order to consider it. The Chair has made a ruling now where it says "Six superintendents at not exceeding $3,800 each" that it would not be in order to strike out "six" and insert "five," or in order to strike out "$3,800" and insert "$3,700." The Chair certainly does not want to put the House—his side of the House, which invariably supports the ruling of the Chair under this administration of the House—in the attitude of supporting a ruling like that; to say that the House reads the Post Office appropriation bill under the five-minute rule—the Post Office appropriation bill, which is 54 pages long, and the rule itself, the original rule, was 37 pages long, and most of it remained in the amended rule—that we read the Post Office appropriation bill under the five-minute rule, and more than half of the bill is not subject to amendment at the amending stage of the bill, when the rule only provided that we should consider legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman states the ruling more far-reaching than it was really made.

Mr. MANN. I refer to the ruling as the Chair made it.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair was that this proposed amendment was new legislation and not in order, and the Chair does not now want to go further than that. The Chair has no pride of opinion in the matter, but the Chair thinks this amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is new legislation, not within the scope of the special rule, and not permissible under the general rules of the House; and the Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois, if the Chair heard the gentleman correctly, understood the ruling too broadly.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rule, where new legislation is made in order like this is, anything that is germane to that proposition is also in order. You have opened the door to new legislation, and you are here considering it under the five-minute rule, and it is our duty to perfect it; and the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] simply seeks to perfect the legislation embodied in the separate report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FERRIS. The Chair thinks the gentleman's amendment goes much further than that. It contains provisions foreign to the language made in order under the rule.

It seems to me it is clearly proper, and I insist on the appeal.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FERRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 5629. An act for the relief of certain persons who made entry under the provisions of section 6, act of May 29, 1908; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 1991. An act for the relief of Abram H. Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. J. Res. 177. Joint resolution to transfer to the custody and possession of the Attorney General sealskins; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. J. Res. 192. Joint resolution granting American citizenship to John Brownlow Ziegler; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

S. J. Res. 214. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to postpone the sale of certain sealskins; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 583. An act incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters; to the Committee on the Library.

S. 3509. An act for the relief of Orion Mathews; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4738. An act for the relief of Frances L. Snell; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 5495. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 6011. An act to reinstate Frederick J. Birkett as third lieutenant in the United States Revenue-Cutter Service; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 6152. An act for the relief of Joseph Gorman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 6202. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress of May 1, 1888, and to extend the provisions of section 2301 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to certain lands in the State of Montana embraced within the provisions of said act, and for other purposes;" to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 6384. An act to authorize the acceptance of certain lands by the United States for a military park reservation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 6497. An act for the relief of Lloyd C. Stark; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 6227. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Norfolk-Berkley Bridge Corporation, of Virginia, to construct a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Elizabeth River in Virginia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS ON CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday to-morrow be postponed until Tuesday next—that Tuesday next be substituted for Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent that the business of Calendar Wednesday to-morrow be transferred until next Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order to-morrow to consider the Post Office appropriation bill instead of the business in order under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that it shall be in order to-morrow, notwithstanding the Calendar Wednesday rule, to consider the Post Office appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what time does the gentleman expect to run to to-morrow night?

Mr. MOON. I was in hope that we might get through by 5 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was endeavoring to cut off debate to-day when debate was proper. I am perfectly willing to have the House meet at a proper hour and stay in session a proper length of time.

Mr. MOON. If the gentleman from Illinois wants to object, let him object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has not objected.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois, if he wants to object, certainly will not ask the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman need not talk as though he was piqued about it. If he wishes to object, why, let him object.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Tennessee is always in a passion while his bill is up.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] objects.

REPORT OF THE DOORKEEPER (H. DOC. NO. 1461).

The SPEAKER. The other day the Doorkeeper filed his report. By an oversight it was not referred to the Committee on Accounts, and the Chair will now refer it to the Committee on Accounts and it will be printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, December 30, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. HUGHES, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. MYERS, and Mr. WORKS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is entitled to the floor.

[Mr. REED addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, since I favor this bill with the literacy test included, I find myself unable to support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The bill itself contains this language:

That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they emigrated from the country of which they were last permanent residents solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution.

For that language the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] proposes to substitute the following:

That the following classes of persons, when otherwise qualified for admission under the laws of the United States, shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious, political, or racial persecution, whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado not only broadens the classes by including two classes that are not at all included in the language of the bill as reported by the committee, but also weakens very much the provisions of the exemption suggested by the committee. The language proposed by the committee is in the case of religious persecution that this test shall not apply when these aliens can "prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or the Secretary of Labor that they emigrated from the country of which they were last permanent residents solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution."

On the other hand, the language of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is much weaker than that, and merely provides that the immigrants shall be exempted from this literacy test when they are seeking admission into the United States to avoid "religious, political, or racial persecution." Then the provision is still further weakened and the floodgates opened still wider by the concluding language of the Senator's amendment:

Whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations.

When this great war shall have been concluded and the nations of the earth readjust themselves again to the conditions that may then exist it will doubtless be possible for almost every immigrant who seeks admission to our shores to claim with some degree of plausibility that he is endeavoring to escape, in part at least, political or racial persecution. I think I voice the sentiment not only of the chairman of the committee, but all the other members of the committee, when I say it seems to us that to so broaden the exception would be virtually to emasculate and destroy the literacy test, and that if this test is to perform the great function we think it will perform and that it is designed to perform it must be left without this amendment, for with this amendment it would be virtually destroyed, and almost every immigrant could escape or evade its provisions.

Mr. President, we have listened to some very eloquent speeches on this subject based largely, if not entirely, on sentiment. Senators have approached this discussion with all the great eloquence of which they are capable, it seems to me, entirely from a sentimental standpoint and not from the standpoint that ought to be their first and foremost consideration, that ought to operate on each one of our minds and control the conduct and vote of each one of us on this question. It seems to me that the first and paramount duty of each Senator on this floor is to consider above all other questions our own country, our own people, and what the effect of this legislation will be upon their well-being and upon the prosperity and happiness and future welfare of our own country.

We are not running, Mr. President, an eleemosynary institution, taking in everybody that we might be sorry for, regardless of what the effect is upon our own body politic. We are obliged to consider as American citizens first and foremost of all the interests of our own people and the future well-being of our own country in making laws. It seems to me the subject ought to be approached from that standpoint and not from the standpoint of sentimentality, of some hardship that might be worked in an individual case or in a few individual cases or even in many individual cases. The general good of our own people ought to be the primary consideration that controls each vote on this floor when this great question shall come to the test of a vote.

There are certain propositions connected with this matter which, from that standpoint, even the most eloquent Senators who have opposed this literacy test and who have favored the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado can hardly deny. First and foremost of all, I contend that the immigrant who does not come to this country with the desire and intention of remaining here and becoming a part and parcel of this country is not a desirable immigrant. I do not believe that the Senator who last addressed the Senate, my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], or the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who spoke here so eloquently yesterday on this question, would controvert that proposition, no matter how liberal their views are on the subject of admitting immigrants at our ports.

The men who come here with no desire of becoming American citizens, with no intention to do so, but simply with the desire and purpose of reaping whatever industrial reward they can from more favorable industrial conditions in this country and from better wages in this country over and above what they could get in their own countries, simply come and strip our country bare, as far as they can do it, and to carry back in triumph to some foreign shore the spoils of their temporary sojourn here. They do not raise the standards of American life or the standards of American politics, the standards of American living or the standards of American wages; they do not even maintain those standards in every case. The general rule is that they lower every one of those standards.

For one I am utterly opposed to any system of laws which will permit any general immigration into this country of men who do not come here with a desire and purpose of becoming a part of this country, of becoming American citizens, and of staying with us permanently; and there are none of the arguments which have been presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] or by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] which could be or would be employed by either one of those distinguished gentlemen in behalf of such immigrants. None of the eloquent illustrations of these Senators, none of the splendid individual cases to which they referred, were of men who came to this country but to exploit and then return to their own countries——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that I stated the same position which the Senator takes on that.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought so.

Mr. REED. That such immigration was undesirable; but I also call his attention to the fact that this committee has not even tried to reach that in this bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I shall endeavor in another part of this argument to answer that comment of the Senator. I am glad to know that he is in sympathy with my views on that branch of this question; in fact, I do not see how any Senator could possibly differ from me if he were a real American and had the real interests of the American people at heart, as I know every Senator has.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish in this connection, because those who are interested and would like to follow the debate in the RECORD will get the facts perhaps better to have them in juxtaposition, to make a suggestion. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] says there has been no effort on the part of the committee to stop these birds of passage to whom the Senator from Georgia is alluding. From its first page to practically the last the bill is devoted to restrictions on steamship companies and restrictions which are thrown around the importation of contract labor, and numerous other restrictions that it is needless for me to mention, but which a casual reading of the bill will disclose.

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, those are general restrictions applying to all immigration. There is not to be found in this bill any provision which undertakes to set up any test by which it can be determined that the man coming here intends to remain. It may be that that is impossible to do, but nevertheless it is true that it is not in the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, with all deference to the Senator's view, I quite agree with my friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. It is in every line of this bill, in every provision of this bill, in every respect in which we strengthen the immigration laws, in every respect in which we impose more rigid tests, in every respect in which we increase the head tax, in every respect in which we prohibit contract labor or the solicitation of labor abroad by contract-labor agencies—in all of these respects and in every respect this entire bill is designed to accomplish that primary purpose. There is necessity for it, too, Mr. President—real necessity.

The strike at Lawrence, Mass., has been several times adverted to during this discussion by Senators who have participated in this debate. It happened to be my fortune to conduct, in part at least, the investigation of that strike while in the other branch of Congress. I devoted a good deal of time to the examination of the witnesses. A most remarkable condition was disclosed in that investigation, which ought not to be lost sight of in this body nor by the American people. Those people at Lawrence, regardless of what Senators may think of the controversy between them and their employers, universally represented that they had been induced to come to this country—they swore it—by flaming posters, picturing the American laboring man clad in glad raiment, returning to his home at night from his day's work with a bag of gold on his shoulder, and that they came over here to get the princely wages that those advertisements represented they were to get. They stated frankly that but a very small percentage of them were naturalized at all, and that a very negligible per cent of them had even applied for naturalization papers. They frankly stated that their purpose was to come over here and get the rich rewards depicted on the flaming posters which had been displayed in the old countries, mostly in Italy, in Poland, and in similar countries, and to make a fortune in a few years, or what would be a fortune according to their Old World standards, and go back again. I say the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from New York are obliged to concede that we do not want that class of immigrants; we do not want people to come here, as the Senator expressed it, as mere birds of passage to rob this country, to compete unfairly with the American workingman, and to strike down American standards. I think we all can agree on that proposition.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HARDWICK. With pleasure.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, having heard the able junior Senator from Georgia revive our memories in this connection with this investigation at Lawrence, Mass., I should like to ask him if it be not true, and if he can not confirm the fact, that the men who really led the violations of law at Lawrence and who were really responsible, if responsibility can be attached to any individual, for the violation of the law, were not men who could both read and write and who were regarded as educated, and that one of them was at the time proposed as a candidate for office in Italy, whence he came?

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator from Illinois refer to Giovannetti?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I think that was the name.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Illinois is probably right, that the leaders of that movement, as are the leaders of most movements, were educated; but their work found easy reception and fertile soil, because they had a lot of people who were ignorant, accustomed to accept any sort of leadership, and were used to being bossed, anyway; who knew nothing, and cared less, about American conditions, institutions, or laws. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to make a suggestion at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Is it not a fact that these educated disturbers of the public peace would have a much less fertile field if they were addressing a people equally educated with themselves?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly true.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And is it not a fact, and the great reason for this very provision of the bill, that its adoption would leave no such field to set on fire by the men so much better educated who would stir those people up to acts of illegality?

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator's statement.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was impressed with the statement which the Senator from Georgia made with reference to the flagrant posters that were distributed in many foreign countries.

Mr. HARDWICK. Flaming posters.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, flaming and flagrant as well, if the Senator please. They were displayed, the assumption is from the Senator's remarks, for an evil purpose. I coupled with that the statement made on yesterday by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], that it was desirable to have a surplus of labor in order to supply the demands in manufacturing towns. I can recall very well at the time, and even before the time, of the Lawrence strike the fact came out that the steamship companies, as well as employers of labor, were eager to have these men come here, and that they resorted to methods that were misleading and unfair in order to induce them to do so. So, if those great bodies of men have come here, the same employers of labor and the great steamship lines have been the authors of this ungenerous and uncanny and unfair movement.

Mr. HARDWICK. The suspicion of the Senator from New Jersey, Mr. President, is not an unreasonable one.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It was verified by statements which I have never seen contradicted.

Mr. HARDWICK. The statement of the Senator is probably—I will go that far—quite true; and yet the evidence we took did not disclose whether or not it was true. Those men did not know who put up those posters. I can quite readily imagine—and I am quite willing to concede, so far as I have any right to concede anything about it—that probably some one put up those posters who had an interest in getting those men to come over here.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Unquestionably.

Mr. HARDWICK. They were the men who put up the money for putting up those posters, which so misrepresented conditions here; but whether the people who did this were the steamship companies, who were interested in making the passage money from these people, or whether they were the people who were interested in the labor market in the States to which these men were to be brought, and therefore interested in getting lower wages forced on working people here in America, it is impossible for me to say. The Senator from New Jersey can draw his own conclusion as well as I can draw mine.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I think it might be well, with the Senator's permission, in that connection to call attention to the statement that was made, I think, by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] on yesterday, that these employees in the mills at Lawrence, Mass., had left their European homes and gone directly to those mills, a circumstance which would seem to indicate that somebody interested in the mills had something to do with putting up those posters and bringing those people here.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That has never been contradicted, although it has been broadly asserted and printed in the public press.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is probably true. I quite agree with the Senator, although I have not the direct evidence to support it. From the circumstances it looks to be true, to a man up a tree, as my friend from Missouri suggests.

But another phenomenon, a natural one, however, Mr. President, in connection with that strike was this: When these people did get in trouble, when this great horde of foreigners who came to Lawrence under those conditions and the first effect of whose importation was to beat down American wages considerably and to drive out other people—American citizens—who had been engaged at a much higher wage in that very work, when they did get over there and found out that the wages they were to get and did get were not quite so high and that conditions were not quite so flattering as had been represented to them, they were bitterly disappointed. They had expected much and they got little, and they immediately began this strike, with some encouragement, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] suggests, from educated leaders. They inaugurated this strike, and when that strike culminated and when the greatest and gravest trouble connected with it was at its very climax, these people, instead of appealing to the American law officers, instead of appealing to this Government, either to the local authorities or to the State authorities or to the authorities of the United States, about the hardships and iniquities and wrongs they claimed were inflicted upon them, turned at once, according to the sworn testimony, to the diplomatic and consular representatives of 16 foreign powers to protect them against an oppression in this land of the free and home of the brave, which they said was worse than any they had ever received at the hands of the Cossacks in Russia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator, since he took that evidence, if it was not shown substantially that in this land of the free the constabulary or the militia had gone to the depot, torn children from the arms of their mothers, and taken them away from them simply because those mothers were sending their children to other communities to be supported during the strike? Was not that shown by the evidence, or substantially that?

Mr. HARDWICK. I can not agree to the Senator's statement of it in those precise words; in fact, there is hardly a part of the evidence, if the Senator will permit me, that was not the subject matter of very sharp conflict and dispute.

Mr. REED. Well, was there not plenty of evidence to sustain substantially that contention?

Mr. HARDWICK. When some of those people undertook to send their children away to other parts of the country, the police undoubtedly at one time stopped them; there is no dispute about that. Of course the method they adopted is the subject matter of very sharp dispute.

Mr. REED. But in this land of the free and home of the brave, if things of that kind were done in violation of the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of Massachusetts, and the principles of the common law and the statute law, is it remarkable that these people lost some confidence in the protection they might get from our Government?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will permit me, I think he has read only a part of the evidence. If he had read it all, he would find out that these same people did not learn their distaste of the American Government or the restraints imposed by American law then. They had it before that time, and before then they had trampled upon and spit upon, according to the testimony of some, the flag of the Republic, to which the Senator has referred so often and so eloquently during his own address. They were utterly impatient, if the Senator will permit me to state my own impression of that evidence after studying both sides of it—these men were utterly impatient of restraints imposed by American law. They seem to have been taught or to have had it in their heads, somehow or other, that when they got here they would be entirely free to do exactly as they pleased; that they were going to reap a harvest; that they were going to get a bag of gold every day for the day's work; and that they could do exactly what they pleased, regardless of the restraints of law.

Mr. REED. Now may I ask a further question to elucidate this matter?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the Senator if it disturbs him.

Mr. HARDWICK. It does not bother me at all; I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator has yielded very generously. The last statement of the Senator might lead to the impression that these people had been generally lawless after they came to Lawrence, Mass. Is it not true that this charge of lawlessness is confined practically to the time of the strike? Prior to that had they not obeyed the law as ordinary citizens do?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that is true. Until the strike itself came there was little lawlessness; but after the strike began, if the Senator will permit me, they seemed to be utterly impatient of all restraint, of all order, and of any attempt to make them obey the statutes.

Mr. REED. Now, the Senator wants to be fair——

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly I do.

Mr. REED. Is not that generally true in most strikes?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will permit me, I do not believe there have been many strikes in this country in which American workingmen have participated where there has been anything like the degree of utter disregard of all law and the utter contempt of all authority such as was displayed during the Lawrence strike; and I think that if the Senator will read that evidence and compare it with anything he has ever heard, he will agree that that is probably the truth.

Mr. REED. Well, the conditions must have been pretty bad.

Mr. HARDWICK. They were pretty bad.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I should like to ask him a question, or, rather, to make a deduction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. These people, as I understand, had been induced to come to this country by flaming posters, which pictured to them a condition of affairs under which they would make a bag of gold or a large amount of emolument. They had been induced to come to this country under intimations that they would be very prosperous; that it was a good place to come to; and that they would enjoy happiness, and make much money. And then, after they got here, they found themselves up against starvation wages and ill-ventilated shops in which to work, and found themselves charged for drinking water, as I understand happened in some of these places. Under such circumstances would not almost anyone become rather impatient with conditions?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think he would; I quite agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. LANE. And would he not be likely to get a little bit restless and have rather a spirit of irreverence for the country?

Mr. HARDWICK. I expect that is true; there are two sides to it, of course. If the Senator will pardon me, these people were not altogether to blame. They had their wrongs; they were brought here by flagrant misrepresentation of conditions, and of course I do not blame them for being disappointed. The point is, they went a long way after they once got started to show their contempt of all authority and disobedience of all law, their utter irreverence for our institutions or for anything they had found after they got here. It is not strange that they did so, because they were badly disappointed at what they found after the representations made to them to which I have referred.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the Senator made any effort to discover what percentage of these men could read and write? That is the question.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can not tell you the exact percentage; I am not positive as to that, but my recollection of the evidence, I will say to the Senator, is that most of these people were illiterate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They could not read or write?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the general impression left on my mind, although I can not point to the testimony just on this point.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask the Senator, further, whether he believes that if these men could read and write the riot would immediately have been allayed?

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me answer the Senator that I think that if they had had sense enough to read and write they would not have been fools enough to be deceived by the posters to which I have referred.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They would not have come here at all?

Mr. HARDWICK. They would have remained away.

Now, Mr. President, I want to lay down another proposition, which is that the immigrant who is not of a type and character capable of assimilation into our body politic is an undesirable immigrant. Whatever the standard of living or the conditions of living in the country that he came from, that immigrant must be capable of lifting himself to our standard rather than attempting or helping to lower our standard to the same level as that to which he had been accustomed or he is still an undesirable immigrant. The immigrant must be capable of making a good citizen and a reasonably intelligent citizen or he is undesirable.

He is not, Mr. President, in my judgment, capable of making a desirable citizen unless he has in him the material from which a desirable voter can eventually be made. In this country, and in all other countries where popular rule is supreme and the individual voter is sovereign, it is all important, if this Government is to endure and if our institutions are to survive, that the individual voter be reasonably intelligent; otherwise he is incapable, however good his intentions may be, of making correct decisions on the mighty issues of government that must be and are submitted to him.

I do not understand the line of reasoning that would lead any Senator to believe that the standard imposed by the possession of a reasonable amount of education is not a good general rule for the ascertainment of intelligence. I quite admit, as Senators have eloquently argued and urged on this floor, that there are many exceptions to the rule. Like all other rules, it is proved by its exceptions. Sometimes you will find a most intelligent man who can neither read nor write and who has had no education whatever, while at other times you will find people who can read and write, those who can barely do so, or even those who can do so with some fluency and readiness, who have no real intelligence. After all, in spite of the exceptions on the one side and the exceptions on the other side, the rule that you can discover and ascertain the existence of intelligence by an educational test is a sound one. It is so sound that many of the Commonwealths of this Republic have applied it in conferring or withholding the voting privilege.

The Senator from Missouri, almost at the end of his speech, said that there had been few of the American Commonwealths that had imposed standards based on intelligence, except the Southern States, where he claimed racial conditions were entirely responsible. In addition to the States of the South, I should like to call his attention to the election laws of the States of Maine, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Ohio, Oregon, California, Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, and Vermont.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And Arizona.

Mr. HARDWICK. And Arizona, as the Senator from Arizona suggests.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Senator can add New Hampshire to his list.

Mr. HARDWICK. And New Hampshire, as the Senator from New Hampshire suggests. Now, it will be seen that in many parts of this Republic the people realize that the sound rule by which to ascertain the possession of intelligence is the possession of a certain amount of education. Not only that, but, with one solitary exception, possibly two, I think every State in this great Republic requires in another way the possession of some intelligence on the part of its electorate by establishing and maintaining the Australian ballot system. The requirement imposed in this way is not quite so severe as some of the other tests imposed in some of the Commonwealths, but generally, especially in recent years, Mr. President, it has become the accepted policy throughout this Republic to limit the franchise to people who are reasonably intelligent and who can exercise it with a reasonable degree of safety to the great public interests that are involved.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in connection with the statement just made by the Senator, I desire to remind him that the Legislature of the State of Colorado at its last session adopted what is called the "headless ballot," which is the pure Australian ballot and which requires, of course, an educational qualification if it is properly exercised. In order to enforce the growth of that qualification all assistance to the voter there is now prohibited, except in cases where he is physically unable to act.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator from Colorado for the suggestion, and I thank the Senator from New Hampshire and all the other Senators who have strengthened and supplemented the statement that I have made on that question.

Now, Mr. President, reverting to the argument from the standpoint of the public interest, from the standpoint of the general good of this Republic, I do not wish to admit to our shores immigrants who do not make good citizens and who will not eventually make good voters. In this age of intelligence, of free schools everywhere, of compulsory education in many of the Commonwealths, as pointed out by Senators on this floor, at this period when we are spending in this Republic $700,000,000 a year on the common schools alone, to say nothing of the other institutions of learning, it seems to me that it is not an unreasonable requirement, in the interest of the public good, to say to the immigrant who seeks admission to our country and who comes to our shores, "If you want to become an American citizen—and we do not want you unless you do wish it—eventually you should become an American voter; we do not wish to add to whatever ignorance we may deplorably have in this country already by admitting you if you do not come up to a reasonable standard of intelligence. It is necessary that you should have a reasonable amount of intelligence if you are to make an acceptable and desirable citizen of this great Republic."

From the standpoint of the public interest, Mr. President and Senators, it seems to me that the argument is unanswerable. I am too anxious to see this bill pass, too anxious to see it come to a speedy vote, to delay the Senate very long by an extended and elaborate argument on this branch of the question, and I have some other ground I desire to cover, so I will pass on from this point.

Now, the literacy test provided in this bill is very reasonable. It provides for bare ability to read, after the age of 16, not English, not the language they must speak here if they are really to become a part and parcel of this country, but their own language, any language, including Hebrew or Yiddish. This test not only provides a reasonable general standard, but, as pointed out by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], this test, as shown by the report of the able commission of Congress that thoroughly investigated this question through long months and years, will at once greatly check the most undesirable streams of immigration that are now pouring into this country.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] wanted to know what those undesirable streams of immigrants were. The Senator from Vermont, I think, hesitated to specify. No such considerations shall move me. I do not hesitate to specify them. In my judgment it is the people from the southern parts of Europe, the most illiterate, who come here with the intention, in many cases, of remaining with us for a brief sojourn and of then returning to their own countries, that we must stop; and according to the report of this commission, which I have studied, those are the streams of immigration that will be most certainly and most effectually checked by this test, if it should be applied.

Mr. President and Senators, one of the distinguished Senators who spoke against the literacy test and in favor of the amendment to it proposed by the Senator from Colorado appealed to the South particularly on this question. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] said that as long as the South had a very small percentage of these people of foreign birth she was not, therefore, intimately and directly concerned with the solution of this great question, and ought to hearken to the political necessities of her northern brethren.

In all kindliness to the Senator from New York and to all others who entertain that view, I wish to enter my emphatic protest, my utter dissent from it. Are we to be forever appealed to on the ground that the South will take a narrow and provincial view of any great question that may come before this body or before the American people? Are we not at last, in truth and in fact, Americans as well as the balance of you? If so, let us hear no more appeals to the South to do something for local reasons or because of no direct or local concern.

Why, the Senator from New York suggested that this question stood somewhat on all fours with certain other questions—local, I think, and the Senator thought so, too; of a local nature—like prohibition, like woman suffrage; questions that each Commonwealth, according to my judgment, ought to dispose of for itself under our dual system of government. But it seems to me that the question at issue here in this bill is not comparable to those questions, and does not belong to the same class at all. If there ever was a purely national question, an entirely and essentially nation-wide question, for the consideration of the American people and the American Congress, it is the question as to what immigrants we shall admit at our ports and to our shores, because when once these immigrants come here they can go to every State in the Republic. They have certain rights that are guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States and by our treaties with foreign powers, rights that no State can deny or withhold.

Tell me that Georgia ought not to vote and voice its convictions on this floor because of the political necessities of New York, Missouri, or somewhere else, because we have not many of these people now? Ah, gentlemen, that sort of an argument does not appeal to me. It seems to me that the State of Georgia has just as much right and just as much duty to voice its Americanism on this question as New York or Missouri, Illinois or New Hampshire, or any other part of this Republic. It is a great national question. There is no local issue in it; and I am bound, as a Senator from Georgia, as I see my duty, to vote for the best interests of the American people as a whole, as I can best see and understand those interests.

I want to say another thing. The appeal was made that we should reject the literacy test for party reasons, for partisan reasons, to aid the Democratic Party in certain States and certain sections of this country. Mr. President, I doubt if there is on this floor, on either side of this Chamber, a more thorough partisan than I believe I am, and yet it does seem to me that there are some questions that ought not to be partisan. It does seem to me that there are some times and some occasions when a man ought to put his idea of the country's good above the party's good, even if it be conceded that the party's good is at stake in this sort of a measure. If I believe that a measure of this kind, or of any other kind for that matter, is all-important for the interests of my country, I can not be appealed to successfully to sacrifice my views or yield my vote because of the interests, alleged or fancied, of the Democratic Party in some other section of this Republic.

I can not agree to the soundness of the proposition, and I can not act in accordance with any such appeal. So far as that is concerned, I believe that the Senators who speak so elo-quently on this question are wrong on the proposition of party expediency. Although I do not live in the sections of the Republic where they have their great political battles, I am not an entire stranger to conditions there, and I believe, so far as political strength is concerned, they would make more headway by standing with us for what we believe is the correct policy, in keeping out undesirable immigration into this country, than they will by standing for a lot of sentimentality that is not based on reason and that is principally good for speech making.

The question is not a new one. Since my public service in this Congress it has been thrashed out many times. We are not jumping in the dark, as my friend the Senator from Missouri suggested, on any of these things. There is no one question that has been so thoroughly thrashed out, that has been so closely studied by able and competent commissions, and on which we have such a great volume of accurate and reliable testimony as this one, in my judgment.

I want to call the attention of the Senate briefly to a short abstract I prepared some years ago on the progress of legislation on this subject.

Outside of the Chinese-exclusion act of 1888 and the various acts amendatory thereof and providing means for its enforcement the following is a brief summary of our progress in restrictive legislation on the subject of immigration:

The first restrictive law was that of March 5, 1875. It provided that persons convicted of felony, other than strictly political offenses, should not be allowed to immigrate to this country, and by the act of August 3, 1882, provision was made for the deportation of such convicts.

By the act of February 26, 1885, it was made unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to prepay the fare to this country of any laborer who was under contract to work out such passage money. This was the first of our laws against the importation of contract labor. The methods and means of enforcing this law were the subject matter of the acts of February 23, 1887, and October 19, 1888.

On March 3, 1881, was approved the first attempt to enact a general and comprehensive restrictive immigration law. For that reason it is both interesting and important to observe its provisions.

In that law the following seven classes of immigrants were excluded from our shores:

(1) Idiots and insane persons.

(2) Paupers and persons liable to become public charges.

(3) Persons affected with loathsome or dangerous or contagious diseases.

(4) Women imported for immoral purposes.

(5) Persons convicted of a felony other than political felonies.

(6) Polygamists.

(7) Contract laborers.

It will be observed that only five of these classes were new, felons having been excluded by the act of 1875 and contract laborers by the act of 1885.

On March 3, 1893, Congress passed another act to provide for the further and more complete enforcement of the act of 1891; but the continual increase of immigration, from about 560,000 in 1891 to 857,000 in 1903, led to the first of our really great and comprehensive immigration laws—the act of March 3, 1903. In that act the seven classes already excluded by the act of 1891 were again excluded, the definitions of each class being more clearly stated and strengthened, and new and important classes were added, such as anarchists, the opponents of all organized government, and those who advocated the assassination of public officers. Transportation companies were forbidden to solicit emigration, and a head tax of $2 for each immigrant was enacted. It is also provided in this act that persons who had immigrated into this country in violation of any of the provisions of law could be deported at any time within two years thereafter. Ample machinery was provided for its enforcement, and the act was passed with the belief that it would cut down immigration and would certainly improve its character. It did not come up to the expectations of its friends, however, because in 1907, 1,285,000 immigrants were pouring into this country and came in that year.

On the subject of our immigrants and their illiteracy there are certain figures here that I should like to call to the attention of the Senate.

In 1903 we had 857,000 immigrants into this country, 21 per cent of whom were illiterate.

In 1904 we had 812,000 immigrants into this country, 21 per cent of whom, in round numbers, were illiterate.

In 1905 we had 1,026,000 immigrants into this country, 22 per cent of whom were illiterate.

In 1906 we had 1,100,000 immigrants into this country, 24 per cent of whom were illiterate.

In 1907 we had 1,285,000 immigrants into this country, 26 per cent of whom were illiterate.

Early in 1906 the Senate Committee on Immigration and Naturalization reported, through Senator DILLINGHAM, a bill providing more drastic and comprehensive restrictions on immigration.

When that bill finally passed the Senate on May 23, 1906, an amendment, first proposed by Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, and afterwards modified and improved by Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, was adopted providing a simple literacy test for immigrants; the requirement being that all immigrants into this country above 16 years old, and not physically incapacitated, must be able to read the English language or some other language. When the House committee reported the bill it still retained the literacy test, but on June 25, 1907, when the House voted on the bill, the literacy test was stricken from it by a very close vote (128 to 116) upon motion of Mr. Grosvenor (Republican), of Ohio.

The literacy test being stricken out by the House and the Senate firmly standing by it, it seemed that the conferees would never be able to agree and consequently that the bill would never pass. It probably would never have done so but for the trouble with Japan, growing out of labor conditions and school troubles in California and all along the Pacific slope. When those troubles came on in the latter part of 1906 and early in 1907 this bill was revitalized and under party whip and spur passed, by compromise, the literacy test being left out of the bill, and provision being made that the President of the United States should be given the discretion not to permit Japanese (or other foreign) immigration under passports issued by any foreign Government to other countries or to any insular possession of the United States or to the Canal Zone, "whenever he was of the opinion" that to admit the holders of such passports to continental United States was to the "detriment of labor conditions here."

In the last session of the Sixty-second Congress, in the closing days of the Taft administration, a bill that was in substance the same as the pending bill and had the same literacy test, passed both Houses of Congress, but was vetoed by President Taft. It was then passed by this body by a two-thirds vote over the veto, and failed by a few votes to get the necessary two-thirds in the House of Representatives.

During all these years illiteracy among the immigrants that come to us is constantly increasing. Furthermore, explaining to the Senator from Missouri and to other Senators who may be interested why I did not hesitate to specify the peoples from the south of Europe as undesirable sources of immigration, I wish to say the reports of the Commissioner General of Immigration show that in the years 1905, 1906, and 1907 of the immigrants that came to us from northern and western Europe but 3.7 per cent are illiterate, while of the immigrants who came from southern Europe nearly 50 per cent, or 42.2 per cent, are illiterate.

Therefore I say those are the streams that we ought to check; and I think the other reason that I gave is also applicable, because those are the people who come here for temporary sojourn more than all others.

Mr. President, I want to state to the Senate in just a few words a summary of the reasons why I favor this bill, which not only increases the restrictive provisions generally against this immigration, but also carries in its provisions the literacy test.

First, I favor it to protect American labor from unfair competition—competition that strips the country bare to enrich other lands, as well as capitalists in our own, and that tends to lower every American standard.

Second, to aid in securing—that is, the literacy test, particularly—a reasonably intelligent electorate for this Republic.

Third, to preserve the American system of government, with all of its standards and ideals, handed down to us by our fathers.

Some particular comment has been made throughout this debate on the little interest that the South ought to have in this question, because she has such a small percentage of foreign-born population within her borders. Let us look at the figures for a minute and see if we can not get something from them.

If we start on the banks of the Potomac and go straight through the very heart of the South to the Rio Grande, we find that in Virginia only nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the entire population is foreign born; in North Carolina only three-tenths of 1 per cent; in South Carolina, four-tenths of 1 per cent; in Georgia, six-tenths of 1 per cent; in Alabama, nine-tenths of 1 per cent; in Mississippi, five-tenths of 1 per cent; in Louisiana,

8.2 per cent; in Texas, 6.2 per cent, an average of 1.6 per cent for the Southern States that I have named. If we take the eleven States that formed the Southern Confederacy, we find that the average percentage of foreign-born population in them is only 1.8 per cent.

Turn for a moment to the other sections of this country, and what do we find? We find 11 great States—3 in New England, 2 in the Middle Atlantic group, and 6 in the Northwest and in the far West—where the percentage of foreign-born population is so large as to be appalling. Let me give you the list of these States, with their percentages:

Rhode Island, 32 per cent; Massachusetts, 31.5 per cent; New York, 30.2 per cent; Connecticut, 29.6 per cent; North Dakota, 27.1 per cent; Minnesota, 26.2 per cent; New Jersey, 26 per cent; Montana, 25.2 per cent; California, 24.7 per cent; Arizona, 23.9 per cent; or an average of 27.4 per cent in the States I have named.

Mr. REED. Foreign born?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir—not of foreign parentage.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator state when those figures were prepared, and for what period?

Mr. HARDWICK. They were prepared from the very best available statistics, and they were prepared less than six months ago from the latest census reports—those of 1910.

The average for these States, as I have stated, is 27.4. According to the same authority—that is, the census of 1910—the average percentage of the foreign-born population of the New England States is 27.9 per cent; that of the Middle Atlantic States is 25.1; and that of the Pacific States is 22.8.

It must be remembered also that these figures do not include citizens born on this soil of foreign parentage. I have not been able to find the official figures on the question of persons of foreign parentage reduced to the percentage basis; but in addition to the population in this country that is of foreign birth the census reports of 1910 show that 18,897,837 were born of foreign parentage, besides 13,343,583 that are of foreign birth. There are over 31,000,000 in the two classes, you see. In the State of Georgia, however, we have only 25,672 persons of foreign parentage, as against 1,395,058 born of native white parents; and the other Southern States maintain almost as good an average on this question as does the State of Georgia.

Such is the situation. These are the conditions that confront us, as disclosed by the official reports of this Government. I do not advert to it in either alarming style or sensational fashion. Nothing is further from my purpose. I have full, yea overwhelming, sympathy with the noble idea that this great country of ours should afford to the oppressed and to the virtuous of every land an asylum of refuge from persecution and injustice, but first of all I would care for our own. I acknowledge in ungrudging measure the great debt of gratitude that we owe to those people of other and less fortunate lands who have sought and found a happier home in our own, giving generously of their brain and brawn to the progress and the prosperity of the Republic, renouncing all conflicting allegiances to become true and loyal American citizens. To such men—and I thank God the vast majority of our southern citizens of foreign birth or lineage can be so classified—no man can extend a heartier welcome than I; but I can not be insensible, nor can you, Senators, to the great dangers that are involved in this situation.

Because we welcome the worthy and the virtuous from every land where they are capable of assimilation with our own people, I do not believe we can afford to welcome here the scum of the earth from every land, who come to this land not to become a part of it but to strip it bare, to take the bread of labor from American mouths, and to carry it back in triumph to some foreign shore.

Nor can I be insensible to the great danger to our American system of government that is involved in the continued and increasing influx of some classes of these foreigners. They know nothing of American history, and care less. They know nothing of American traditions and institutions, and care less. In large part they do not speak and can not or will not learn our language. They come here filled with all sorts of socialistic, anarchistic, and nihilistic ideas, a fact which can not always be proved at the immigration station, impatient of all restraints imposed by law, and utterly and supremely indifferent to the welfare of that country in which they propose to linger only long enough to make enough money to support them in comfort elsewhere.

Mr. President, I can not help but feel, I can not help but believe, and I believe it profoundly, that the gravest danger this country and this system of government can ever be subjected to is liable to come from these people who come over here not as the people to whom my friend, the Senator from Missouri, referred so eloquently to-day and yesterday, to become a part and parcel of this country, who are capable of assimilation into our body politic, and whose sons and daughters are fit to intermarry with our sons and daughters, but who come here for the purposes of industrial exploitation, utterly ignorant of the history, the traditions, the sentiments, and the institutions of this country, and utterly indifferent to them.

It seems to me that the pending bill, particularly through the literacy test, is calculated to stop the most vicious, the most dangerous, of these elements. I have supported it for years in another branch of Congress. I had the privilege of reporting from the Committee on Rules, under a special rule, the very bill that we are now considering, when it was reported to the other House of Congress. For years I have stood for it. I have voted to pass it more than once, and once over the veto of a President of the United States. I believe in the literacy test with all my heart and soul; and I know that when I give my vote and voice for this measure I voice the will, the sentiment, and the belief of the great Commonwealth of Georgia.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Louisiana desire to occupy the floor?

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I may speak for about one minute on the amendment only.

Mr. LEWIS. I should prefer to yield.

Mr. THORNTON. I have no desire to speak now. I understand the Senator is prepared with a set speech.

Mr. LEWIS. No; I have no set speech.

Mr. THORNTON. I have no desire to speak now.

Mr. LEWIS. I only wanted to yield to the Senator if he desired to take the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield completely, if the Senator desires.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask permission to have placed in the RECORD a clipping from the Washington Star of last evening, showing that the immigration of the last fiscal year reached a total of 1,485,957. This newspaper article also deals with the difficulty of medical officers making proper inspection of the tremendous number of immigrants that are pouring into the ports of the United States. I ask consent that it be placed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator.

The matter referred to is as follows:

IMMIGRANTS REACHING UNITED STATES TOTAL 1,485,957 IN YEAR—PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE SHOWS GREAT DIFFICULTY IN MEDICALLY INSPECTING ALL.

Railways and steamship lines brought into the United States in the last fiscal year a total of 1,485,957 immigrants, according to a statement of the Public Health Service, just issued. These immigrants entered this country at 80 points of entry, including 25 seaports, and they came to the land of the free from 25 different foreign ports.

These figures are given in the Public Health Service's statement to show the magnitude of the task of medically inspecting the vast horde of aliens that enter the United States each year. More than 100 steamship lines bring immigrants to this country, and by reason of the fact that some of the ocean lines have vessels arriving at from two to five American ports, it has been found that there are 173 lines of immigrant travel from foreign countries to the shores of Uncle Sam's domain.

The number of immigrants examined at the different ports and places varied; for instance, from 1 examined at Wilmington, N. C., to 1,009,854 at the port of New York during the last fiscal year. In addition to this, 80,322 immigrants arrived at Boston, 40,248 at Baltimore, and 60,483 at Philadelphia during the last fiscal year, the total being as stated above.

As a result of the examination of the above-mentioned 1,485,957 immigrants 41,236 were certified as having diseases either deportable or reportable under the immigration laws. In order to give the medical examination to such a large number of immigrants it is necessary that the officers of the Public Health Service detailed for this duty be specialists in the various lines of diseases.

These officers, when they examine large numbers of immigrants, at once seek first to eliminate the perfectly sound persons, which they are able to do with remarkable accuracy on account of their long practice. The remaining immigrants are then disposed of in the order of the importance of their diseases. For example, if an immigrant has a slight deformity which will not bar him from entering the country, he is detained only long enough for a record to be made of this deformity. This soon leaves only those immigrants who are to be subjected to a careful examination to determine whether they are likely to become public charges if admitted to the country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator from Illinois pardon me for a minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, gladly, Mr. President—gladly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think we are now drawing to a point where every effort should be made to have a vote on this bill. I said in the beginning that I was not going to attempt to shut off any debate nor seek to prevent those who disagree with the committee from expressing themselves fully. Those who are in favor of the bill have refrained from any very lengthy discussion of it, believing that the country was pretty well satisfied and would stand with the Congress in reference to it.

I sincerely hope those who intend to address the Senate on this bill will be prepared, because, so far as the rules will allow me, I shall force a vote on the bill at the earliest possibe moment when debate shall have been exhausted.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, for myself I will yield to the chairman of the committee if he cares to present any views at this time. I will yield gladly, and when he has concluded, if there are some matters I care to offer, I will take the liberty of doing so in a very short period of time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not care to address the Senate at this time. There are some general facts in reference to certain statistics that have been given and points made that I, at the conclusion of the debate, may take the time of the Senate to refer to. Otherwise we will come to a vote.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if there is no one else who desires at this time to occupy the floor, there are a few views I should like to express; but I desire to yield to any other Senator who would care to occupy the floor at this time, whether he is for or against the measure.

As there seems to be none who desires at this time to be heard, I wish to put into the RECORD the dissent that I have from the feature of the bill and from the provision known as the literacy test.

I recognize that the support of this measure and its opposition is largely guided by the question of locality. I recognize very firmly that a man is impressed by the constituency he represents and that, however much he may desire to speak a general view applicable to his country at large, he is greatly influenced by the situation surrounding him at his home, and something of the political considerations of the constituency for which he speaks. For myself I confess, without reservation, that I am greatly concerned as to this limitation from two viewpoints:

One is that as an American, with my attitude addressed to that which I understand my country stands for, I can not give it my approval.

Second, the interest of the class of people who make up approximately one-half of the population of the great city in which I live and a very large percentage of the splendid State that I have the honor in part to represent admonishes me that I can not allow a provision to be introduced and passed as a law while I am their representative which they feel lays a bar sinister against those of their blood—their brothers and sisters, their fathers and mothers—and places a barrier of the future against any advance or opportunity to those now born or hereafter to be born whose only misfortune is that they live in a land where despotism exercises its powers upon them and opportunity of complete freedom has been denied them.

Mr. President, I take the liberty to accept the invitation of the honorable chairman of the committee to present such objections as I have. First, I have tendered a motion to strike out this section in so far as it contains a clause making the educational test or test of literacy a standard of admission into this country. I address myself at this time to the motion of my own and at the same time to the merits of this amendment.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] evidently is not on the floor. There is a matter I should like to call to his attention that embarrasses me very much. To the Senator from Missouri, the distinguished gentleman who has lately regaled us with a most edifying exhibition of his learning upon this question generally and his wonderful industry, I should like also to confess that I am very much embarrassed with this amendment.

This amendment, as well as the provision in this bill, reads that no one shall be excluded who is fleeing from either religious or political persecution, also that anyone shall be admitted by the officers of our Government who may be adjudged as having fled from religious or political persecution. The fear I have lies in the complications to my Government which either the provision in the bill or the amendment will undoubtedly entail. The moment we establish it in the discretion of any administrative officers to render decisions that they admit A, B, or C upon the grounds that A, B, and C are then the victims of religious or political persecution from a certain named country we authorize our administrative officers to indict that country as being guilty of religious persecution or political persecution. We therefore give our approval to such administrative indictments by our Government, therefore holding them up before the world as having been convicted by America of having inflicted religious persecution upon A, or that we admit having found judgment against that foreign country for the political persecution of B, and therefore admit him and thus impliedly likewise enter judgment of condemnation against that country.

Then we awaken, I fear, by those provisions a legitimate form of retaliation on the part of those countries by their administrative officers in the administration of some of their particular Provinces to pass upon the property rights of some of our citizens who may be living abroad, the right as to whether he is a real American or an affected one, whether he is really a foreigner notwithstanding he contends he is an American, and impress him into domestic military service on the theory that they have the right through their administrative officers to decide that he is a mere ruse, a mere pretense, a mere hypocrisy. If we vest in our administrative officers the right to pass a judgment of condemnation upon the foreign countries on the ground that they are persecuting for religious purposes a citizen, and we permit him to enter with that judgment against them, they have a grievance against us.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, yes; I prefer to be interrupted. I may be wrong, and I want the view of the Senator.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the language he is now criticizing is the language of the bill, not of the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. That is correct. I am now speaking of the bill—that feature of the bill and to the amendments of similar purport—which to my thinking offers such opportunity of so great offense to the foreign countries as to invite serious conflicts and entail upon us complications which may have a result very embarrassing and at this particular time particularly dangerous. I illustrate:

Suppose a Turk, a subject of the Ottoman Empire, who claims to be an Armenian, comes to the gates of Castle Garden and applies for admission. He can not read or write, and he is subject to the inhibition of the bill. But through an interpreter or a representative he shall have it manifested that he is fleeing; that from the fact of being a Christian the Turkish Government is charged by him with persecuting him. It shall be so manifested to those to whom we have committed this discretion, and the commissioners there and the commissioner here at Washington shall decide to uphold his statements, affirm his accusation, and give judgment in his favor. What will it be? It will be that Selim Brahim, or whatever may be the name of the kind, is admitted into the United States on the ground that he is an exile or refugee from religious persecution visited upon him by the Government of Turkey. So thus we have indicted Turkey and found her guilty by an administrative judgment of our own officers which we must give approval to by giving the man the right of entrance.

Second, a Jew from Russia comes to our gates. He can not read or write. Likewise he comes within the inhibition of the measure, but those interpreting for him say that he is fleeing from political persecution. They manifest it in such a way that those commissioners say, "We adopt it as true." They write a judgment that Joseph Abraham can not read or write, he is within the inhibition of the law, but nevertheless we find that he has been persecuted for political purposes by Russia, and because of this political persecution of Russia we admit him. Result: We indict Russia as being guilty of political persecution and by that indictment enter judgment against her.

I need hardly say to my esteemed colleague that by a multiplication of these instances we have an army of affronts against these different nations and give them an opportunity to retaliate against the property of our people wherever they may be located in foreign countries, or against our people wherever opportunity may arise of a nature so fraught with danger that one step further may bring resentment by it for wrong done in retaliation, and we will find ourselves in a very serious conflict.

I now refer to the personal feature. Expressing sympathy for the unfortunate condition of the Jew as depicted through all history in which he has suffered, recognizing the conditions to which all of us at any time address our sympathy, I fear that if my country shall inaugurate the precedent of finding a judgment at Castle Garden against Russia on the ground that she has been guilty of political persecution, we will awaken her treatment of retaliation against the Jew there to so cruel an extent that the hardships visited upon him will be multiplied in numbers there to such measure and more severe in character than otherwise would be visited upon him.

Therefore this provision in the bill at the outset I regard a dangerous one. I see it filled, measuring it as I must, with very serious consequences to my country. I see it also, as I view it, fraught with great danger and injury to those who are the subjects and objects of our solicitude and supposedly of our protection.

The amendment offered by the learned Senator from Colorado has a phrase in it that arrests my attention seriously. Knowing him to be a very eminent lawyer, having knowledge of his capacity long before I had the honor to join service with him in this body, I know he will agree with me that if we adopt in this body an amendment which authorizes the admission of persons into this country who it may be said had been the subjects of persecution for their religion or their politics, and we added to that "and this to be true, whether disclosed by overt acts or general conduct," we then call for those to render the judgment and to inscribe under that amendment the proof of the judgment.

The proof therefore would have to be some assertion on their part of an act that they said was an overt act on the part of that foreign Government or conduct which they would have to specifically define in some form or way. Therefore we make the issue specifically, and they have a right to be heard upon it. We can not render ex parte the judgment and find the facts without hearing the other side and then upon all render judgment. How would they have a right to be heard? Through their representatives or their ambassador or minister; and then we create a forum in our own country to retry a matter of fact, and we pass judgment whether that particular fact is overt as a fact sufficient upon which to enter judgment. When we differ then from the foreign country in their construction we again give particular offense. I fear that it must be too plain to the eyes of a thinking man for us to hope to avoid the complication.

Seeing, therefore, in the passage of the bill—likewise in the proposed amendment—expressions that I feel involve us in serious trouble and great danger, I prefer to avoid them both by striking out of the bill the particular provisions that have given rise and made necessary or seem to justify those particular resorts which either the framers of the bill had in their minds at one time or the distinguished Senator from Colorado, aided by the Senator from Missouri, have in their minds at this time.

Mr. President, I must concede that there will arise in this Government a time when indiscriminate immigration must be the subject of some form of qualification. I must concede that there must arise in my country an hour or a season when some form of defined qualification would be necessary and serviceable. I am not prepared to say it has now reached us. I find myself by every instinct within me inclined to the ideals which the fathers founded in this country of opening the gates of this Nation to those who are oppressed and seek an asylum of liberty and refuge of freedom. It is enough for me that I can view the broad waste of land expanding before the eyes, far out in the West, unoccupied, literally an empire that may today inhabit, care for, guard, and protect all the citizens of all Europe—with the single exception of Russia—without intrenching in the slightest degree upon the physical liberty of any existing American.

I do fear, Mr. President, the hour when my country shall begin to break down these ideals and shatter these foundations. My mind reverts to an interesting incident that possibly the able Senators about me recall as recorded in history. When Lowell was representing this country in England Guizot, the French historian, happening to be visiting London, it is reported that he addressed Mr. Lowell and said, "How long, Mr. Lowell, do you think your Republic will last as such?" To which Lowell is reported to have said, "Just so long, sire, as the sons shall be faithful to the ideals of the fathers." Having some regard, Mr. President, to this creed, I hesitate to adopt a policy that shall remove the sons from obedience to these ideals.

I recognize, Mr. President, that there may be questions that require some careful study and the application of some wisdom to a future condition that can arise and may apply to this country.

What, therefore, is the object of the bill? I gather that the object of the bill is to place some barrier on immigration. Why? Upon the ground, you say, that it invites ignorant and unlettered human beings into the Government. If that were the principal object, I am compelled to invite the attention of my colleagues to the fact that they gathered up millions of such in the Philippine Islands and placed them in the body of the Government by a mere act of conquest, and the reports demonstrate that more than 4,000,000 of those individuals have not the slightest conception of the matter of education or learning. So there can not be the same solicitude against some one entering into our Government who may be unlettered. It would seem rather late to consider that.

Shall it be my distinguished friends from the South, for whom I have great affection of course, from my birth and tender associations, when we have in Porto Rico, with an illiteracy reported of 22 per cent, all put into the Government at the very door and gate of our Nation, all of whom, under our Constitution, have the right to come and go as they please in every State of our Union?

What was the solicitude of my distinguished friend from Vermont, the very able Senator, former chairman of this committee in the previous Senate, now the ranking minority member, against the coming in of those who were illiterate or lacking literacy when these particular measures I refer to were foisted upon the Nation?

I must therefore conclude that there is another purpose, not simply the object of avoiding those who may not read or write, and that purpose must be to prohibit or limit immigration. Mr. President, why? I assume that able Senators have not expressed their whole reason, and that in the mind of some of the Senators espousing this measure the conditions of war in Europe menace them or admonish them that when the war is concluded there will be thousands upon thousands attempting to find their refuge here in our country. I assume that there are Senators who feel that this is an approaching danger which should be avoided, and that to these able Senators there has been communicated from certain gentlemen who mean well and have an honest fear in behalf of labor that such might be the fate to be visited upon the toiler.

Mr. President, Patrick Henry is supposed to have uttered in the House of Burgesses an interesting bit of philosophy, though Aristotle seems to have expressed something of the same kind. From Henry we delight to quote that—

> We can only judge the future by the past; I have no lamp to guide my feet but experience.

I call attention to the fact that immediately following the great wars of the world immigration has ceased; it has not been stimulated. I call attention to the history, familiar to my learned friends about me, that when France and Germany had their conflict and after Sedan, when one might have imagined that from France or Germany would have come teeming thousands of those who sought to rescue themselves from conditions unbearable, at least certainly not agreeable, when one might presume they might have emigrated, we discovered to the contrary; their fields were open; their children had to be maintained; their lands to be sustained; new opportunity to all survivors had arisen. France not only gathered itself together, but its people multiplied around its farms and habitations and grew into such affluence that it was able to pay the great indemnity levied by Germany, and in science and small arts became one of the superiors of the earth.

Germany, from a country that was a fifth-rate power, held her people close to her fireside, stimulated by patriotism, builded her farms, inspired their education, reanimated their hearts, filled their souls with desire for superiority among mankind, and, barring the instances of those who fled under the charge of some form of political offense, such as in 1848, there was, indeed, little immigration. It did not begin until 1885 from Germany, and then when peace had settled upon the community and arts of industry and science and the refinements of culture had possessed its country to the extent that the nation started upon the splendid course of eminence and glory, which all friends of Germany delight to certify to.

Shall I refer to my own land? Here sits around me the sons of the Confederate soldier and around me likewise those of the Federal. They have not much memory of it, possibly, but they have a memory of that which was related to them by their fathers. When the South and the North had that unfortunate conflict, when that cataclysm severed us apart and sent the two sons of one mother to die by the bayonet of the brother, and it was all ended, did our people in the South forsake their hearthstones, fly from their people and take refuge elsewhere? No; they returned from the battle field to the farm. They returned from a soldier's lot to a civilian's pride. They returned from the camp to the home and builded the South to a splendid degree of affluence and a glory of eminence in letters and statesmanship, which has been the pride of every American to allude to wherever the history of this country is recounted. Did our honorable opponents—speaking as a southerner—of the Federal Army, forsake the hills of Vermont or New Hampshire? Did they leave Ohio and the broad rivers of the West? Not at all. They builded New England anew. They started ablaze the manufacturing eminence and fortunes, set her glowing furnaces out on every rockside, her little cities multiplied in number and manufacturing arts; and increased was the splendor of her people. Her literary masters and her colleges became the pride of New England, and her sons, moving into a second and third generation, peopled the far West with intelligence and respectability to a degree that every State in the West rejoices to pay tribute to.

Did the men of the great Middle West, which had tendered so much in that splendid sacrifice, forsake their homes? Far from it. They likewise took new life, new vigor, the sons to the plow, the boys to the store, all the family to the home, and builded the great country and the eminence of the empire where she stands the marvel of the world and all mankind who view the achievements of men wherever they reach wonderful altitudes.

So, I must feel that it is the truth that after great wars shall have severed people and left them destitute for a while, they do not flee from the charred ruins, the stripped home, the pained scene, the graves of their dead. They build commerce, homes, churches; reerect their habitations, their mansions of industry, their factories of toil, and their homes of comfort.

If I were inclined to adopt the fear of many gentlemen whose views of course we greatly respect—in assuming that there was inclination on the part of those to leave their homes and come to this our country in such legions of numbers as seems to be the expressed fear—I am compelled here in the exercise of prudence, nevertheless on secure reflection, to recognize the country in which these people live. Will these governments sit idly by and allow the soldier to leave the field and flee his country and leave it barren and desolate? I can not assume it. There are too many methods readily arising to the mind of man, however lightly skilled in statesmanship, for him to overlook that there will be methods found by which these individuals and citizens will not be allowed to leave those countries, and that there will be such embargo and embarrassment, or rather barrier, that we need not fear even if the inhabitants had hoped to come.

Now, Mr. President, I invite your attention to the other danger of the measure. It is provided that this shall be a test. Senators, if the real purpose is to limit immigration, why not do it? If there are dangers upon the country by the multiplication of foreign citizens, why not announce it? If the time has come when an embargo shall be put upon them for any reason for our self-preservation, why not do it? Why adopt a method which on its face is a ruse and will fail of its object, is covered with hypocrisy—in all phases a pretense—and carries with it neither the suggestion of statesmanship on the one hand nor American courage on the other?

If there are dangers menacing this country from immigration sufficient that we should adopt a plan by which it should be limited, let us announce to the country where these dangers lie, set them forth specifically, give the reasons, and announce the remedy as an embargo either absolute or for a limited time, and go to the country with the justification of the action. But this ruse, which will be regarded by our fellow citizens as a pretense, will serve neither to satisfy those who wish to stop immigration nor limit it, and will greatly offend and wound those who feel it is addressed against them, their blood, and their household.

He shall read to the "satisfaction." Well, let us contemplate. I may be pardoned if I indulge in the speculation of a prospect. I will assume that a Democratic national administration is in power and that it is understood that the Bohemian and the Pole, coming from countries standing for principles against the kingdoms and empires, for which a democracy is supposed to be spokesman, offer themselves for entrance at Castle Garden. Those officials are Democrats, we will say. Do you think they will be exercising a very high degree of caution as to the extent that they mean to be satisfied as to whether those whom they feel would make Democrats can read, and are you not quite content that any degree of reading, quite slight, might satisfy those particular gentlemen? If you assume that that much might happen, as you know it has happened in cases I shall illustrate in a moment, you realize, therefore, that the expression "to the satisfaction of these individuals" only gives to this particular administrative court a form of discretion to wholly avoid the provision, or they will comply with it in such a reckless manner as to have it amount to absolutely nothing whatever as an embargo or limitation.

Now I will assume that our honorable opponents are in power and it is those who come from the northern countries, from the Germanic Provinces, where it is assumed that they are inclined more to a centralized form of government than to a republic. Will my honorable opponents on the other side doubt for a minute that the same human nature on the part of their commissioner will be that which has been evidenced and evinced by mine; that as to these northern nationalities who are making their way to those States that are distinctively Republican, or which he fancies will be done, knowing that inclination of the past, will not find it most agreeable to be quite satisfied with any kind of representation of reading, knowing that politically they will contribute a great deal so soon as naturalized?

Again, will any one of these commissioners hesitate to grant every form of latitude rather than offend the particular element of nationality the same as these applicants, wherever they are, who are voters already, and thus run the risk of having themselves left in disfavor by their party leaders—those responsible for their appointment? We are human; we know that human nature is strong for self-preservation and that such would be the result.

My distinguished friend from Mississippi, the senior Senator [Mr. WILLIAMS], the other day, in an address for this bill, called attention to the fact that he would, if left to himself, be glad to advise more States to adopt something of an educational qualification for voting, such as he said Mississippi and Massachusetts have for the exercise of the suffrage; but I am sure he, and likewise the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], will agree with me that where it ever comes to test these qualifications for the right to vote those in charge of the ballot box or of the political machinery have found it ever agreeable to see that these are always quite competent whenever their nature or vote is gathered and comprehended or understood. We do know that in the great cities of our country these forms and qualifications are always overlooked.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I very much dislike to interrupt the Senator from Illinois, but——

Mr. LEWIS. I am glad to have my astute and classical friend from Mississippi interrupt me, because I know he contributes information whenever he speaks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Your friend from Mississippi is classical enough, but not always astute.

What the Senator from Illinois a moment ago said, or hardly said, but interrogatively asserted, is so unjust to the State of Mississippi and to all of her authorities that I would feel false to the State if I kept silent. There has never been a charge made by anybody worthy of anybody's credence at any time that in the execution of the laws of the State of Mississippi, in so far as determining whether or not a man could read or write, there has been any bias in making the determination. Furthermore, it would be impossible for there to be. A man must step up and sign his name, write the name of the precinct, and other things. The very fact that he can do so proves that he can read and write.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am too much inclined toward great affection to the State of Mississippi, to her very great statesmen, and to my distinguished friend who so honorably represents her, not to concede at once that whatever errors or vices or offenses might apply to any other State in the Union, of course are exempt from Mississippi; but the thing I do allude to, and that which I must insist upon, is that wherever you create a principle and make it an object or compensation to the individual who has discretion, to enforce, as under this bill, to say when it may be and how, he will protect his object——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have no quarrel with that, nor am I disputing the argument made by the Senator from Illinois, because I do not care to do it at this moment. It might be very easily disputed. But the Senator from Illinois dragged Mississippi's name into the controversy, though the Mississippi law does not provide that the man shall read satisfactorily to anybody. It simply provides that he shall read and write; he simply has to prove that he can read and write, not satisfactorily, but that he can read and write. I again repeat that the bitterest enemy of Mississippi has never asserted that in carrying out that law there has been any fraud or any unfairness or any prostitution of it for political purposes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my distinguished friend the Senator from Mississippi says that he does not rise at this time to dispute this premise of mine, but that it can be very easily disputed, indicating that what is easy to be done he can do. That I readily confess; but I say to my able friend from Mississippi that it might be true that in the case of Mississippi there is no law requiring one to read to the satisfaction of anyone else or to have these qualifications to the satisfaction of anyone else; but I ask of my friend: Is it not true that if it could be so regulated that every white man in Mississippi could vote without regard to whether or not he could read or write it would be allowed if by the same provision the negro, or the objectionable negro, could have been denied the right to vote?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In reply to the change of base just made by the Senator from Illinois—to which I can compare nothing in all history except McClellan's change of base in front of Richmond—I confess that his last interrogative assertion is perfectly well taken. If Mississippi could have permitted all white men to vote, regardless of their illiteracy, and could under the Constitution of the United States have disfranchised all negroes, in perfect frankness I say she would have done it; the Senator knows that as well as do I; but the point which the Senator previously made was a different one altogether. He asserted, or interrogatively asserted, that when we did fix a literacy test we have not fairly applied it, and that I deny.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my distinguished friend says that I have changed my base, and likens the change to what he says is the only similar instance in history, which is the change of base of McClellan before Richmond. I do not know whether my learned friend likens me to McClellan; I would, of course, be complimented by that likeness; or whether he likens himself to Richmond. If to Richmond, I know he means the Duke of Richmond, who was supposed to be a most eminent swordsman; and, of course, conscious of his capacity in that respect, I would not change my base to be in front of such an antagonist; but I say to my friend, I take his answer, that it is true that Mississippi would allow every white man to vote if she could, without regard to whether or not he was able to read or write; therefore the able Senator answers my indictment that there is no literacy test in Mississippi, that it is a test against the negro, not literacy, but to provide a method by which the black can not vote; and in order to prevent that, some whites, of course, come within the same category.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois pardon me a moment?

Mr. LEWIS. I am glad to have my friend interpolate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator says because there was something that Mississippi would have liked to have done and could not, and therefore did not try to do, that therefore the thing which Mississippi did does not exist; he says that because Mississippi would have liked to have admitted all white men to the ballot and to have excluded all negroes, and because under the Constitution of the United States she could not do it, and because she resorted to a literacy test to approximately reach the same result, therefore she has no literacy test. The Senator might just as well say that because a man was sick and needed quinine and could not get it and therefore took something else, he did not take the other thing at all or that he never saw it. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Occupants of the galleries are the guests of the Senate, and it is a violation of the rules of the Senate for them to express either approval or disapproval of any of the proceedings in the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it was only a matter of time, I knew, when my able friend would conclude his interpolation by something bitter—in this instance by an illustration of quinine. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. The medicine is bitter enough.

Mr. LEWIS. But I must say I accept the premise, and assert that if a man wished to take quinine and took something else, I would still insist that he had not taken quinine; I accept the proposition. I also say that if Mississippi has prescribed a test which she calls a literacy test for the purpose of voting, and that her object was merely to prohibit the negro from voting, that she was not prescribing a literacy test as a qualification of voting, but was merely prescribing a method that could be an embargo upon some; and having adopted this as that refuge she could accomplish that object, and that the principle behind it was not to prescribe a literacy test as a condition precedent to the right of a human being to vote, because she would have gladly given every white man the right to vote without regard to whether or not he could read or write if she could have done so consistently without allowing the ignorant negro likewise to vote—therefore having had that offered from so eminent a source as the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, I accept it.

Mr. President, I now proceed to point out what I said was the danger—and I know my friend will concur—with the provision of this bill vesting the discretion as to whether a person shall read to the satisfaction of somebody. That really does not prescribe any specific limitation upon the entrance of any person into this country, nor does it prescribe specifically any specific condition which prohibits in itself specifically by a rule of action or by law any class of people. Therefore, it is a ruse; to me it is a deception. It is one which could be practical, as I see it, in a manner that would work latitudes of favor in one direction and of favoritism or discriminating favoritism in another.

Mr. President, I have the second point to urge, which I beg my learned friends, as we are speaking in this matter as in a conversation, to contemplate with me. I could not give my approval to a principle which makes the test of education the right to enter into this country without conceding that there was inherently in the country the right to make education the test of deporting a man out of the country; for the very moment we concede that principle in this Government we break down every ideal, shatter every foundation, and destroy the theory upon which we are founded for the preservation of liberty and the advancement of freedom to man. Sir, after that, that before a man can enjoy the principles on which this Government was founded we should have a form of educational qualification, the very next step must be that no man then would have a right to remain in the country who has already come in unless he likewise has the same qualification; and there will be a clamor at the door of the Capitol on the part of the very same influences that are seeking to inscribe this particular qualification in the law to deport all those already in the country if they likewise are not within the privileges of this exemption. Therefore I fear the introduction of this innovation; I fear the precedent it establishes.

Once, Mr. President, as I have said, you start upon this course there is no point at which you can stop, for the very next step will be, as intimated by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], the able chairman from South Carolina, and my very distinguished and always alert friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that there will arise in the minds of our countrymen the qualification of education for suffrage. We will have established it for entrance into the country, and we will then have established it as a qualification for remaining in the country; and then will arise that other demand that a man shall have a form of education before he shall vote; and the moment that is established, following this precedent, then we will have that other, which will follow fast upon its heels, that men shall sit in judgment as to whether a particular individual is educated sufficiently to cast a vote at a particular election, and that will turn upon the particular politics of that particular machinery.

I fear, therefore, Mr. President, the introduction of this innovation. I fear the future, and I say to the laboring man, I say to their eminent labor leaders, for whose sincerity we have great respect, for whose character we vouch with great confidence, that if it shall ever be successfully urged in this country that a man shall have to undergo an educational test to enter into this country the very opponents and persecuting tyrants of the toilers of this country will be found banding together to impose an educational qualification upon their right to vote. This upon the theory that that qualification can be so manipulated as to cut the great majority of the votes of the poor out of the participation in the political contests of this Republic. I, therefore, for that reason can not give my approval to the precedent that I fear is being established upon the part of the proponents of this measure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before the Senator passes to another subject——

Mr. LEWIS. I gladly yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should have asked the question which I am about to ask a moment ago. The Senator has said several times that this bill provides that the immigrant must be able to read to the satisfaction of some official. Where does the Senator find that provision in the bill?

Mr. LEWIS. I ask my able friend who shall decide whether the immigrant can read? Somebody must decide.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator, however, said that the immigrant must read to the satisfaction of some one; which would imply, as I understand him, that the examining official could exclude him upon the ground that he did not read as well as the examining official thought he ought to read.

Mr. LEWIS. To which I answer, yes. The examining official would have a right to say, under this provision, as I see it, that the reading was not reading according to his judgment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not so read the bill. It seems to me that the bill lays down about as definite a test as could well be laid down in that kind of a case.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator kindly read the paragraph in section 3.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The provision is as follows:

All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish.

Those are the classes of people to be excluded. Then there is a certain proviso which does not apply until you come down to the nineteenth line on page 8, and that provision reads:

That for the purpose of ascertaining whether aliens can read the immigrant inspectors shall be furnished with slips, of uniform size, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, each containing not less than 30 nor more than 40 words in ordinary use, printed in plainly legible type in some one of the various languages and dialects of immigrants. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in such language or dialect.

If the immigrant reads the words printed upon that slip, as I understand there is no discretion vested in the inspector, he must admit the immigrant; and if he fails to read them, then he must be excluded.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I suspect that the Senator from Illinois has obtained his impression as to the meaning of the bill by the provision on page 9, where the proposed amendment is to be inserted, which reads:

That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they emigrated from the country of which they were last permanent residents solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is an entirely different matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think that is where the Senator from Illinois got his idea. In that provision are found the words "prove to the satisfaction," and so forth; but under the literacy test as provided in this bill the question of admission is absolutely in the hands of the immigrant himself; all he has to do is to read a certain number of printed words, and if he does, he is entitled to admission.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. According to my understanding, that is the end of the matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There is no limitation whatever.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If he reads the slip, he is admitted; while if he fails to read it, he is excluded.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I thank my able friends, but I do not misapprehend the provision at all. I may be in error as to my conclusions; that is a mere difference of opinion; but I most respectfully urge upon my learned colleagues that the bill provides that an officer—I have called him a "commisioner," because the head officer is the commisioner, but I should refer to the others as underofficers; and in that respect only is my nomenclature inaccurate—the bill provides that an inspector shall hand the immigrant a slip containing printed words in some prescribed language, and the immigrant shall read to the inspector. Therefore the law creates the inspector the judge as to whether the immigrant is reading sufficiently well, and vests in his sole discretion the judgment as to whether the immigrant reads with sufficient intelligence and knowledge as to characterize his performance as reading within the meaning of the law as that inspector sees it. Does my able friend from Utah deny that that is his privilege?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly clear from the provisions of this bill that the sole test is whether the immigrant is able to read the slip which is presented to him. The question as to whether or not he reads it well or reads it ill does not enter into the matter at all. The Senator from Illinois would read very much better than I would read, and yet if we two presented ourselves to the inspector I do not understand, if we could both read the slip, that the Senator from Illinois would be admitted because he read it better than I read it and that I would be excluded because I did not read it so well. It is a simple test as to whether or not the slip can be read, and if it is read, then the immigrant is entitled to admission.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, I will give to my friend a simple illustration. A child is 4 or 5 years of age. The affectionate mother has begun to teach it its letters, and the child with a few letters brought together may be able to recognize and spell the word "dog" or "cat," and yet it could be clearly and truthfully said that the child could not read, although the child might be able to designate those one or two terms. So the immigrant inspector has to decide in his own judgment whether the method of procedure, the final pronunciation, and the final discharge of the undertaking amounts to a reading. I am sure if that be not in his power there would be no power in him at all, because otherwise you would leave it to the applicant himself to be the sole judge as to whether he could read. Somebody must decide as to whether he has complied with the reading test, and therefore I am merely calling attention to the fact that that very discretion offers such room for abuse, as I see it, and the provision is likely to receive such administration as will make of it an instrumentality of persecution or a farce, and even if it did not, I maintain that no such qualification would serve either the purpose of preventing bad men or unworthy men from coming into the country or putting a limitation upon immigration to avoid any evils, if such evils exist, from the influx of immigration.

Why, sir, would it be but a ruse? I see sitting around me Senators who will recall the history of certain contract-labor laws, and, without reviving it to their minds by reading them dreary excerpts from the books, how well do they remember that hordes of individuals, in numbers, schools, classes, circles, and communities, were all prepared as to certain forms of interrogatories and certain forms of answers by which the law was violated wholesale through these instrumentalities. Supposing that these particular slips are prepared and the slips are in the hands of the immigration inspectors, is it not perfectly clear to us all that it is only a matter of time when every one of these slips will be known, after having been presented to the first few hundred immigrants, to the other few thousand? They will all be known; the words used would be relatively few. The trick of having the immigrants educated to just that exact extent is so apparent that, far from serving the purposes for which it is designed, my distinguished colleagues, it will offer an opportunity for abuses by making liars of the people who come in, common tricksters of those who desire them to come in, and the perpetrators of fraud on the part of those who administer it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LEWIS. Gladly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator think that the law requires that the same slips shall be submitted every day?

Mr. LEWIS. No; I say to my friend that it would not be so, and that is why I remark that after a great number of times they would have to be duplicated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the same slips were used they could be memorized, but if different slips were submitted on different days they could not be memorized.

Mr. LEWIS. If different slips were offered on different days it would only be a matter of time when a certain number of slips would be well known and a certain number of words well understood, because the number of words that would be used would be relatively limited, and it would only be a matter of time when enough knowledge could be communicated to those at home by those who had arrived to serve the purpose of the ruse and work a deception upon the whole system.

I am afraid my able friend from Mississippi misapprehends my purpose. It is this: To demonstrate that the number of people that it might really keep out in its final and legitimate application would be so small that it would really work no benefit against evil, if evil there exists in this country, nor would it avoid the repetition or multiplication of that evil if such is now threatened from foreign shores.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was about to suggest to the Senator, in line with what the Senator from Mississippi has suggested, that this matter is entirely in the hands of the Secretary of Labor. He is to prescribe the slips, and it is not to be supposed for one moment that he will use the same slip over and over again or even a limited number of slips over and over again. Having the administration of this law in his responsibility, he would undoubtedly try to make it effective, and he would prescribe slips of an indefinite and unlimited variety so that there would be no duplication one day after another.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There could be a new slip every day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; there could be a new one every day.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, may I ask the Senator from Utah to hearken to me a moment? The Senator from Utah will now see the application of my previous strictures. Upon that theory the Senator from Utah will see that the inspectors might fear that those who had arrived had communicated some of the contents of their slips to those who were coming, and therefore to prevent them from having the benefit of that memorization he would insist on the immigrant being able to read every word upon the slip, and should he fail in some one word the inspector would assume that the immigrant read only from memorization of the few words that had been communicated to him from previous slips, and under the discretion vested in him he could declare that the immigrant does not read sufficiently well. At once it will be seen that there is room for a trap or for a trick or for deception.

Discretion would be to a great degree exercised in order to avoid the very thing that I say is possible in the memorization of these slips. The inspector would have to go to the very extreme in order to avoid it. Learned Senators will see, I am sure, what I mean. It is not that I am criticizing the bill for this provision. I recognize how very difficult it is to make any provision that would serve your purposes. I am pointing out that this particular provision, as you may readily see, does not serve the purpose, if the purpose is to keep out of this country objectionable people, who, because of their numbers, would be ill or evil to our Nation. This particular form of embargo accomplishes no result, produces no remedy, and relieves us from no misfortune.

Mr. President, I want to call attention, as I proceed with this discussion, to some plain facts. I call attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I recall that the history of this whole legislation discloses that the Senator from Vermont, as chairman of this committee in the preceding Senate, had occasion to make a number of reports. In his very able presentation on yesterday we discover that the Senator's remarks include, first, the commission of 1882, which made representations to the country setting forth the class of immigration that was undesirable. But the commission of 1907, by a strange turn in the wheel of possibilities, appears to recommend as wholly available those who in 1882 were denounced, and finds a new order in 1907 as the objectionable ones.

The Senator from Vermont produces a table, which I dare say can not be disputed, which discloses that in the one census taken at the time of the first immigration 14 per cent of these individuals could not read, but immediately following, in the very next census, only 3 per cent of the same. This shows you very clearly, my brother Senators, that after arriving in the country they had been here but a short while when their illiteracy very largely decreased, and they became sufficiently learned to be placed in the category of the learned of our citizenship. Moreover, any elements of objection which had prevailed at the time of the commission of 1882 had been wholly removed, or so largely that in 1907 those who were the subjects of denunciation in the first report were the objects of commendation in the second. So it is clear that the standards which we assume to adopt at this time may be equally obsolete and equally inequitable and unjust 10 years from to-day, or 5 years, as the one thus created in the short hiatus disclosed by the speech of the able Senator from Vermont.

Mr. President, the city that I represent, speaking personally—as I live in Chicago and my able colleague lives in another portion of the State—has a very large foreign-born population. It may interest you to know that there is not a nationality that is known that has not some representation in the splendid city whence I come. The people of these nationalities feel greatly aggrieved that a committee of this body recommends that their families and their kinsmen shall be eliminated from the enjoyment of the liberty of this Nation, and particularly that it is proposed that they shall be eliminated, prohibited, and forbidden upon reports in which they were allowed no opportunity of hearing. They say that their nationalities had no representation; that they were given no chance to present the real knowledge that could have been given; and they propound the query to us: When has any commission from this country gone abroad to study the real class of people, as they live and exist, who should or should not be admitted into our country? What qualifications would you say you possessed to prescribe who should be admitted from any knowledge you have of these people, the land in which they live, the distresses which they suffer, the despotism which they endure, the persecution which afflicts them? They call to your attention the fact that you sit in solemn chamber here at Washington, you hear a few individuals, and from these individuals, numbering no more than the fingers upon your hand, you make a computation of the millions which represent their blood and brawn, their life and character, their achievement and sacrifice, their nobility and suffering, their life and death; and they inveigh against the injustice of it as they see it. They feel that this honorable body has not qualified itself to pass judgment upon them, their generation, and their time.

Mr. President, I must insist that there is one test that it is well for us to undertake. It is the test of the character of the individual. I would it were in my power to devise at once and spontaneously and recommend to my colleagues some prescription and standard by which to test the character and fitness as human beings of those who come to enjoy the liberties of our Nation, my reason being that no man has a right in this Nation who does not come with the idea of respecting its institutions, revering its sacred traditions, living for its glory, and dying for its perpetuation, if need be. If a man, whoever he is, by his associations in the place from whence he came, by his life and habits, is so situated that clearly, upon analysis of the man, he is unfit to enjoy the privileges of this Nation because of the danger he threatens, the things he menaces, such a one should be prohibited. But, Mr. President, I am not able to concede that the mere fact that a man can not read is a standard by which such could be judged.

Here sits my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], to whom I pay the compliment, without qualification, of being one of the learned scholars of our body. His writings, his lectures, his eminence in many directions testify to that. He referred to McClellan in a gentle passage between ourselves—a very eminent soldier. Since his knowledge of martial matters, I know, is equally good in all respects, I invite his attention to one of the most remarkable cavalry officers the world has recorded—Murat; Murat of Napoleon's campaigns; so magnificent an officer that he was the only man from whom the great Stonewall Jackson of this country seemed to feel justified in taking a lesson, and yet Murat was once a waiter in a restaurant, unable to read the slip to let the man know how much he owed when he wished to collect the bill of the public house.

My learned friend will recall that the barons of Runnymede, who laid the charter of the liberties of our country, not only could not read, but the king to whom they made their approach made his only sign by the hilt of a halberd. Surely these, to whom we appeal as the sources of our inspiration, the very monuments of our renowned civilization, could not have been such if the mere test of reading and writing could have been applied to test their manhood or patriotism.

The able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] gave us a catalogue of the number of people who have come into our country and by their splendid performance of citizenship have commended themselves to our admiration and left behind them the record of their glorious deeds who in the beginning could not read. Therefore I am not able to accept the idea that the mere matter of reading can be the test of the soul. I can not accept the idea that reading is the test of the worth of life. I can not accept the idea that mere reading will make a law-abiding citizen. To the contrary, I must insist that many men who have committed offenses in this country against our laws—and who ought to be, if they could be, taken from out of our country because of their deliberate, impudent defiance of our institutions—were those the most learned—learned in craft, learned in the skill of disobedience, learned and equipped in all the methods by which they might violate the law and escape the penalty. Therefore I must respectfully urge that the real test of citizenship in this country—the right to enjoy the liberty and freedom of this country—should rather turn upon something else than this which is prescribed under this bill.

Mr. President, I have now manifested very clearly my objections to the fundamental phases of this proposed legislation. I heard my learned friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the committee, the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and the able senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] enter into some disputation as to the class of people who were supposed to be the objects of this bill, to the effect that they crowded into the cities—that they did not till the farms.

Mr. President, it may be true that the citizens from the northern European countries have gone to the farms in greater number than those from the south; but, Mr. President, I invite attention to the fact that that does not apply solely to the foreigner. Our cities are congested with American-born citizens. They are congested with people who come from our own little country towns. The cities are congested because of the allurements of the city to the individual, not because he is a foreigner. The reason why the farms are not occupied by these people from foreign countries as well as from our own is not because they might not prefer the farm, but because our Government has offered no inducement calling for the humble individual from abroad to go to the farms. It offers him no encouragement; nor does it offer such to any American crowded in our cities. Our country offers him the barren land; sends him empty handed to the naked soil, to the bleak winds, the frosty mornings, the cold and chilling nights. He is without a dollar, without a cent. He must enter upon that land. No provision is made to give him the implements by which he may undertake farming. There is nothing to give him a home in which he may be sheltered, no provision to induce him to remain on the farm by which he might stay there and provide a living for himself, habitation for his family, or cultivation of the soil. If conditions were changed and our Government turned itself about to make some slight provision for these people in order to encourage the settlement of the farms, the criticism of the able Senators that these people flock to the cities instead of the country, I am sure, would not have applied. Therefore we see very clearly that the real reason they are in the cities and not on the farms is not because of preference but because of conditions.

Mr. President, this provision of the pending bill, so far as I am concerned, wars against every principle of the Democracy. I am unable to see, from my point of view, how the spirit of Democracy, which is supposed to open wide its arms, to extend them to all the oppressed, can say: "Yes, unless your oppression has been so great that you have not even had the opportunity of learning how to read. If so, you can not come in. If your oppression has been so great that you have been oppressed to the degree that you could not even have the opportunity of a schooling by which you could learn of the reasons of your wrongs or where you may get your rights, you shall not come in. We tell you that your oppression has been too great, and for that reason you are not to have the benefits and privileges of this land of liberty and this asylum of freedom." What form of exception is this that you can dare to justify before the great heart of the Democracy of this country?

This provision wars, as I see it, against the spirit of Republicanism, which is to open the gates of this Republic to those who cry for freedom and liberty, to those who deserve it because of their manhood, their character, their life—they who show by their existence obedience to the laws of man and reverence for their responsibility to God. If there shall come a time when the mere presence of immigrants shall menace our country in other directions, then we can address ourselves to it by giving the reasons, and then, upon these reasons, act openly, nobly, frankly, and trust to the good sense of our Republic to justify our course. But, as I see it, this device works a fraud. This ruse works a deception. This pretense gives no relief, and inflicts the Democracy, for which I assume to speak, and the spirit of Republicanism with an outrage and a wrong.

Senators, as I view it, you can not pass this bill and any longer hold us up before the country as representing the spirit that gives refuge and asylum to oppression. If you pass this bill, your next duty is clear to my mind—that we immediately pass an act that shall have for its purpose the tearing down of the statue that is at the gate of New York as we enter into this Republic the endowment of Bartholdi, a Frenchman of German extraction, and that we cast it into the sea. In its place, instead of an inviting figure with its arms extended, with Liberty enlightening the world, inviting all the oppressed to find asylum and refuge here, let us change its aspect. Instead of those kindly eyes looking out over the seas with welcome, let us insert as eyes fireballs that glare and blaze defiance and threat. Instead of the extended right hand opening its palm and welcoming these people as friends, let it clutch a weapon that threatens to strike to death their dreams. Instead of the kindly, smiling lips that it presents, welcome and gracious invitation to all those who are oppressed to come, let us put upon those lips scorn at misery, sneer at oppression, and inscribe as the motto on its brow, "Let no one hope to enter here. To those who are oppressed let them beware! The more oppressed you are, the less hope you have in this Nation. The more has been your oppression, which has added to your misfortunes at home, the more we will continue you where your misfortunes may increase, your misery multiply." Let us dethrone the statue, cast it into the sea, and a truth this measure speaks—warning such as Dante saw over the gates of the inferno—that "they who would enter here leave all hope behind."

Senators, I tender my motion to strike out this section, because, as I view it, it is un-American, un-Democratic, un-Republican, and visits an injustice and an outrage upon the spirit of freedom of this the American Republic.

Mr. LEWIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire, as a portion of my remarks, to introduce an article from Current Opinion, being an extract from Edward A. Steiner's story, "From alien to citizen." It is only a page and a half. If I may introduce that in my remarks at an appropriate point, I should be glad to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE AMERICAN SPIRIT THAT OVERCOMES RACE PREJUDICES.

At a time when the revival of so-called racial animosities appals the world an American may experience another kind of thrill by reading Edward A. Steiner's story of his life in America, "From Alien to Citizen." In its spirit and in its record of personal experience the book is a document of extraordinary "human interest." Prof. Steiner's delight in relating an incident of his ciceronage of the minister of public instruction of Hungary in Chicago is typical. They had been watching a social-settlement basket ball game over which his excellency became enthusiastic. "Of course, these young men are native Americans," he commented. With perfect assurance, Prof. Steiner replied: "There is not a native American among them. The losing team is made up of Slavs from the Stock Yards district, and the winners are Jews from the neighborhood of Twelfth and Halstead Streets." To prove it, Prof. Steiner called one of the players, asked his name and birthplace, and said, "Now, my boy, I want you to meet his excellency the minister of public instruction of your own country." Prof. Steiner continues:

"With perfect democratic dignity, the boy shook 'his excellency's' reluctant hand, saying heartily: 'I am glad to meet you, Minister. How do you like Chicago?'

"It took 'his excellency' some minutes to recover from the shock. Then he said to me in tragic tones: 'It is impossible! This boy belongs to the lowest of our subject races. We have ruled them for 900 years, but have not really conquered them. We have forced our language upon them, and they have refused to speak it. We have forbidden the use of their mother tongue in the higher schools, yet they never forget it, and with each year they become more and more Slavonic. You take our refuse, our lowest classes, and in a generation you make Americans of them. How do you do it?'"

Prof. Steiner grew up among Slovak boys and left his Jewish mother in Hungary to come in the steerage to America. His story shows intimately the forces which are at work, both for good and evil, upon the immigrant—the sweat shop, the mills and mines, with their grinding labor; the lower courts, the jail, the open road, with its dangers; the American home, the college, and the Christian Church. He now occupies the chair of applied Christianity at Grinnell College, Iowa, and has become most widely known for his personal and public work for immigrants. "I have tried," he says, "to humanize the process of admission to this country, to expose and abolish the worst abuses of the steerage, and to interpret the quality and character of the new immigrant to those Americans who became hysterical from fear and believed that these newer people were less than human.

"Upon the vast army of workers who free us from hard and dangerous toil we must look with the respect due to their calling. The man who goes into the depths of the mine and exchanges his day for night, that we may change the night into day; the man who faces the boiling caldron and draws ribbons of fire from the furnace for our safety and comfort; the man, the woman, and the child who have bent their backs to stitch our clothes, have not only justified their existence but have made ours easier, more beautiful, and safer. That they are Hungarians, Italians, or Jews ought to make no difference, for, after all, they are human."

Against holding the immigrant responsible for every supposed evil to which society is heir, Prof. Steiner has stood out. If he is optimistic regarding the future, he says it is because he knows from actual experience that the newer immigrant is just as worthy as those who preceded him.

"I have shared his economic burdens for many years and have seen him lifting himself and his family to a new and higher level. I have watched him develop his downtrodden strength and his hidden talents. I have also sounded the note of warning, for I have known him to become more and more the victim of our industrial maladjustment, suffering anew from overstrain, accidents, and occupational diseases.

"Over and over again I have traveled the 'trail of the immigrant,' from shop to mill, from farm to mine, and back again. I have retraced my steps to the villages and towns of the Old World, and have repeatedly gone over the selfsame path which once I traveled from sheer necessity. I have joined my life to thousands and tens of thousands of these strangers. I have helped to create groups of faithful workers and have endeavored to fill them with the prime requisite for their task—an effective sympathy.

"I have touched in the great throngs the men and women who voluntarily or perforce have become the neighbors of these aliens, and they have justified my faith. I have not yet heard an ill word spoken of them by those who know them best. Their detractors always live at a distance."

Climate, quality and quantity of food, economic opportunity, a good wage are important environmental influences. But Prof. Steiner's plea is for the strengthening of the one power which he has found most active in shaping and reshaping not only his own life but the lives of others—"the spirit of democracy, which basically is supreme confidence in man."

The generations which are to follow as a result of race mixtures here, Prof. Steiner thinks, "will be an American type in whose shaping environment will play a larger part than inherited race qualities."

"We are told by a certain professor whose genius in generalizing is unquestioned that we shall become a mongrel race and lose all those qualities which have made us virile, intelligent, and resourceful.

"Others tell us that we shall become a superrace, inheriting the virtues of all these people who mingle with us; that we shall surpass every other nation in strength and talents.

"I am frank to say that I do not know what will happen. The effects of intermarriage are imperfectly understood, and we have no reliable data; but I am not a believer in the immutability of race. I stand between Chamberlain's 'Rasse ist Alles' and Finot's 'Rasse ist Nichts'—race is everything, and race is nothing. My own observation has led me to believe that nothing serious happens when a child has in its veins a mixture of Latin and Saxon blood, and that Slavic and Semite mixtures, and others, too, have produced normal children."

It was in the Lower Town Church, in a large city of the Northwest, situated between huge terminal railroad yards, that Dr. Steiner changed the text of his preaching from "People, be good" to "People, be good to one another." There was a cosmopolitan congregation of wage earners, he tells us, Scotch, Scotch-Irish, and real Irish; Germans, English, and French; Swedes and Norwegians, one happy Italian, and a few Americans. The children were mixtures of many races, and they constituted splendid new stock to quicken the life of the Nation:

"In Lower Town I saw the supreme test of the church accomplished. A vital unity was created among people of different races and tongues. They were bound together into a new blood kinship which is wider than tribe or nation or race, and they were a new people, one in Christ Jesus.

"There for the first time I came in touch with the 'Melting Pot.' It was not a chafing dish with an alcohol lamp under it, as many, forming their conception of it from Mr. Zangwill's rather mild drama, imgained it to be; it was a real, seething caldron, with its age-old fires of hate and prejudice threatening to consume its contents. Then came the torrent of love, with its mighty power, putting out the old fire by kindling a new one.

"There in Lower Town my neighbor, an old Jewish rag man, came and asked me to 'commit a matrimony' by marrying his niece to as typical an Irishman as I have ever seen. There, too, I baptized the baby born of that Irish-Jewish parentage.

"The relatives on both sides claimed the privilege of selecting its name, and decided on Patrick and Moses, respectively. A conflict seeming imminent as I stood ready to perform the sacred rite, I interposed, and with one syllable from each name, baptized the child Patmos, which satisfied both factions."

"This boy Patmos," adds Prof. Steiner, "became rather symbolic of all my ministry, for it has been my supreme effort to reconcile old divisions, blot out old hates, and bring into kinship those who have been afar off. It would be too great presumption to believe that I have always succeeded; but to feel that I have tried, that I am still trying, and have not lost faith, that it shall ultimately be accomplished is something in which to glory."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rise now not for the purpose of making any extended remarks, nor for the purpose of making any argument upon this subject, but, in the interest of historical accuracy, to correct a mistake made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

He referred to Murat as having been "a waiter in a restaurant," who "could not read the tickets which were brought to him with the meal charges." So far from this being the case, Mr. President, Murat had been a student of theology and was educated for the priesthood. Murat was never, so far as I know—though, among his varied experiences that may have been one, however—a waiter in a restaurant at all. He was the son of an innkeeper, and from that fact, perhaps, the Senator from Illinois got his idea.

If the Senator will turn to the Century Cyclopedia of Names, he will find the following (italics mine):

Murat, Joachim. Born at Bastide, Lot, France, March 25, 1771; executed at Pizzo, Calabria, Italy, October 13, 1815. A French marshal, and King of Naples, brother-in-law of Napoleon I; famous as a cavalry commander. He was the son of an innkeeper; studied theology at Toulouse; entered the army as a volunteer, and served with distinction in Italy, 1796–97, and in Egypt, 1798–99, becoming a general of division—

And so on.

Mr. LEWIS. Pardon me; my distinguished friend forgets that he was taken up after being a waiter, his education paid for, and given inclination to the clergy. Friends took him and sent him to college; but he was a waiter in his father's place and could not even read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Illinois, in illustration of his point, quoted Murat as the instance of a very distinguished man, who had had a very distinguished career, who could not read.

Mr. LEWIS. He began his life——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, there was a time in his life when he could not read, of course, and a time in mine when I could not read. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator referred to him as an instance of a man who had done very distinguished things and achieved very great things, notwithstanding that he could not read; and said that he was "a waiter in a restaurant"—not that he helped to serve guests in his father's inn at times—and that he could not read the meal checks that were brought to him, from which the inference was left upon the minds of the Senate that this great cavalry leader performed all of his great achievements without the advantage of being able to read the general orders of his commander in chief, even.

Now, I will go a little bit further.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, just a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi further yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one moment I will yield again to the Senator; but I want this to come along regularly.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; but I must beg the Senator not to——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator refuses to yield for the present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not at this moment. I will yield in a second.

If the Senator will turn again to the Encyclopædia Britannica he will find, under the head "Murat," the following:

Murat, Joachim (1767–1815), King of Naples, younger son of an innkeeper at La Bastide-Fortunière in the Department of Lot, France, was born on the 25th of March, 1767. Destined for the priesthood—

From his very boyhood—

he obtained a bursary at the College of Cahors, proceeding afterwards to the University of Toulouse, where he studied canon law.

That is, ecclesiastical law.

His vocation, however, was certainly not sacerdotal, and after dissipating his money he enlisted in a cavalry regiment. In 1789 he had attained the rank of marechal des logis—

And so forth.

Now, this has nothing to do with the debate, Mr. President. I merely called attention to it because, in the interest of historical accuracy, I knew that the Senator did not want to leave behind him a misapprehension. He did not want to leave behind him the notion that this great cavalry commander did all that he did without being able even to read, and if so, not even the general orders of his commander in chief.

That reminds me that during the debate several little mistakes of that sort were made. The other day a distinguished Senator, in paying a tribute to the German race, mentioned Edison as one of the Germans in the United States. Edison's ancestors came to the United States from Holland, not from Germany; they came here in 1730 and settled in New Jersey in 1730. So he is about as good an American as any of us, because none of us were Americans before we came, of course. [Laughter.] We came from somewhere in order to get here. All the white people did, at any rate. The only real native Americans are the Indians. [Laughter.]

I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, no one finds greater consolation than I in the fact that we have in the Senate a gentleman who feels it his privilege to rise and correct what he thinks have been all the errors of all the Senators all the time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator for the purpose of being insulting. I yielded to the Senator for any question that he might put or any argument that he chose to make. It is absolutely untrue that I have undertaken to correct all the errors of all the Senators at all times, and the Senator knows it. I have corrected one individual error, and a very flagrant one, of this particular Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator knows that no Senator is further from the suggestion of an insult than I. For myself, if anyone intimated that I had the capacity to correct all the Senators in all the errors that were made, I would regard it as a great tribute, not an insult.

I wish to say, however, that the learned Senator has called attention to the after days of Murat, and he has intimated that I sought to intimate that when that officer was a marechal he could not read his orders. Nothing of the kind was ever intimated. The Senator found that agreeable to suggest, in order to verify positions he had heretofore taken. Nothing of the kind had been intimated. I used the illustration in connection with those whose origin was very humble who rose to very high stations, who had obtained an education with great difficulty, and coupled the matter with similar instances which had been referred to by the Senator from Missouri.

Now, I will say to my able friend that I may not be so skilled in all the details of all history——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator for a speech.

Mr. LEWIS. I would love to make a speech to my able friend if it would be appreciated. I desire to say, if he will pardon me, that I shall place on his desk in a few days, as my colleague, a book I have written on France—not an exceedingly good book, not so learned and capable a book as might be written by many others; but in this book I have devoted a small chapter to this individual, after having given considerable investigation to his character, surroundings, and career. I think the Senator will see from that chapter that the early origin of Murat has been well fortified by footnotes, and that these encyclopedias to which my friend had to take his recourse to find information regarding this distinguished gentleman only referred to the latter days of his life when he reached glory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am not referring to the latter days of a man when I quote the authority to the effect that he was "destined for the priesthood," went through a college, and afterwards went through a university. He did that, of course, while he was a boy; not after he became a man.

I do not know what was in the mind of the Senator from Illinois; but I frequently find that there is a disposition to confer all sorts of honor upon ignorance, and that it is very popular to do it. When the Senator made that assertion it did not accord with my recollection of history, and therefore I got these books for the purpose of finding myself wrong or else dissipating that idea as far as I could.

There is generally a disposition, I will not say to make an apotheosis of ignorance—because unfortunately ignorance is not yet dead in this world, and an apotheosis can only come after decease—but to make a eulogy upon it, and to try to prove at all times that many men have been great because they were ignorant. Now, there have been a few men in this world who were great notwithstanding the fact that they were ignorant—some few. It is true that the barons at Runnymede could not sign the Great Charter. It is true that many a king in Europe at that time could not have done it. It is true that for years and years that hardly anybody but the priesthood in all Europe could read, hence the "right of clergy"; but that does not prove anything in modern America or in modern Europe at this time. We are in a different age and must meet a different competition.

There is no excuse for a man with an enterprising mind and with any native intelligence at this hour of the clock in the twentieth century, or at an hour of the clock previous to this in the latter part of the nineteenth century, in either Scandinavia, or Germany, or Holland, or Belgium, or France, or northern Italy, or Scotland, or Ireland, or England, or Wales reaching adult age without being able to read. There is but one of two reasons in the world to be given for it—either laziness or stupidity.

The school facilities in Germany are better than they are in the United States. The school facilities in Switzerland are better. The school facilities in France, and in Belgium, and in Holland, and England, and Ireland, and Wales are every bit as good; those in Scotland are better. The school facilities in the greater part of Scandinavia, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden are better than they are in the United States. All this talk about their not being able to read and write because they are oppressed is not quite accurate.

There are parts of Europe where people can not read and write because no opportunities have been furnished them, or, rather, because sufficient and abundant opportunities have not been furnished; but that, again, is not the point, Mr. President. We are not excluding the individual because of lack of individual honesty or character. As I said the other day, we are not aiming at a person. We are aiming at a thing, and a dangerous thing—ignorance—a thing dangerous to morals, dangerous to civilization, but above all dangerous to free institutions in a country where every featherless biped who reaches 21 years of age can vote. The father of Democracy himself laid down the principle that the perpetuity of this Republic depended "upon the intelligence of its citizens," and when the Cortez of Spain, the Spanish people having arisen against Napoleon and undertaken still later to establish a Republic, enacted an educational franchise, it was Thomas Jefferson who came out in one of the most eloquent letters ever written welcoming it as a step forward in the march of civilization which hitherto no other people had had the sense to make.

You are not oppressing a man because you are keeping him out of America, keeping him from becoming a member of our family politic. Gentlemen talk as if everybody born on the surface of the earth had a God-given right to come here and pretend to be Americans. I do not believe that even my ancestors had a right to come here and take the land from the Indians without paying for it and without their consent. That is going back to sure-enough native Americans.

Of course the word "Americanism" in a certain sense is a mere comparative term. One man's ancestors coming in 1608 and another's in 1730, as Edison's did, another comes 100 years later, and all that, but all of this is wide of this mark, Mr. President. All of it is wide of the salient point, that if we want to take care of the Republic, if we want American traditions and American ideals and American civilization and American free institutions conserved and perpetuated, then we want the foreigner who comes to our shores to be what? First, able, competent, intellectually "fit" to help mold our institutions, to assimilate our traditions, to further our ideals, to improve our institutions.

That is first, and second what? And upon this I, in my thought, am emphatic. We want a man who, when he took his naturalization oath, did not swear to a lie, who, when he said, as a condition of naturalization, that he cast off all allegiance across the water did not keep concealed a mental reservation to king, kaiser, czar, emperor, what not, who did not come here with the idea that it was permissible after he had settled here to regulate his conduct in America as an American citizen by something going on beyond the water. The minute he does that he confesses he committed perjury when he took out his naturalization papers.

If you are going to have a foreign-born man help to mold American institutions, let it be a man who is competent for American citizenship, and, moreover, let it be a man who is willing to be an American citizen, who down in the bottom of his heart means what he says when he takes his naturalization oath, and who does really mean what that oath means, that the sole loyalty he in his heart holds to any government on the surface of this earth is loyalty to the Government of the United States.

As far as I am concerned, and I rather like plain speaking, I do not want anybody else of any other sort. If he has the slightest mental reservation whereby he proposes to mold or control or influence American institutions or politics, in war or peace, in sympathy with some other country's institutions or national ambitions elsewhere, then, even if he can read and write, I do not want him. If he can not read, I do not want him even then. He could not understand and appreciate what his new allegiance means.

I think after we are through with this immigration legislation we ought to go further in connection with our naturalization laws and make a man when he took his naturalization oath swear if a war took place in Europe somewhere between his old country and some other he would still preserve his allegiance to the American flag and not go across the water in order to serve in the armies of one of the contending parties, and that when it came to a posssible mental reservation retaining allegiance to any other power he ought to be made to assert that, to the best of his ability, he would never permit himself as an American citizen in connection with American domestic or international political questions to be influenced by the interests of the country of his nativity.

You may call that narrow if you want to. It may be. All patriotism is narrow to some extent. There will come a day when patriotism will go out of existence, because every man everywhere in a high state of civilization will be a citizen of the world, and he will not stand upon the idea of putting the interests of his own particular country foremost. But we have not reached that age yet, and as long as we have not reached it we want men who profess to be American citizens to be Americans. I do not mean by that to be born in America. I do not mean by that to have had a parent born in America; but that they shall love America, that they shall assimilate American traditions, that they shall love American ideals, and that they shall be capable, at any rate, of understanding American institutions.

I go further than that. I can not say with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] that the proposition of not admitting a man to our shores because he has not a certain degree of intelligence carries with it as a corollary the idea of deporting him if he does not. I can not go that far; but I certainly would not arm ignorance, even though already existing in the United States, with a sword which it does not know how to use—the ballot.

The so-called right of suffrage is not a right at all. It is a privilege conferred upon the citizen by society in the interest of society. Little by little it has broadened and grown, covering more and more people, taking in more and more individuals, because little by little competency and fitness and intelligence have broadened and grown. It ought not to broaden and grow one whit more than competence and intelligence do. You can not confer a worse curse upon any community in the world than the much-vaunted American "universal suffrage" if a majority of the people in any section or community armed with the ballot are incapable of exercising the ballot intelligently. You had better have an intelligent king. You had better have anything than that.

But I did not rise to make a speech. I had no idea of doing it. I merely rose to correct some errors, and these errors I rose to correct not because they are important in themselves, but merely because they are indications of the readiness with which the human mind conceives the idea and loves to conceive the idea that the miraculous has happened, that a particular lame man without hands can write with his toes, that a particular man without the capacity of reading still shows great intelligence on some subject.

This tendency is general.

There was another great cavalry leader during our own war. I believe half the people of the United States believe that Bedford Forrest could not read and could not write. He could not write very well, but he read very well, and he was by no means a general all-around ignoramus. He was not a college man, but he had a satisfactory "old field-schoolhouse" training—not a bad one, by the way. The stories that are told about him, with all sorts of nigger language put into his mouth, are not true. I happened to know him myself. Gen. Forrest spoke very good English when he wanted to. People love to believe these things just for the same reason that they love to be told stories about a blind man who can make his way all around, or about a deaf-mute who had been taught to sing or speak. To find a man who can not read in the twentieth century and who is still intelligent and competent for citizenship and competent as a molder of the destinies of the American Republic is just as remarkable as any of these other remarkable things. These things do happen, but they do not happen very often.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have spoken twice before to the Senate on this subject, and I should hesitate, I realize, to speak again, but I wish to say we were not all blessed with living in affluence, with a wealthy father, and enabled to have the blessings of the higher education that my distinguished and lovable and genial friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] had. While he was basking in the universities of Germany some of the rest of us were earning bread and butter. So we are to be pardoned if we do not take exactly the same view he holds.

My friend the Senator just said that he wanted men in this country who were intellectually fit. Great God, our States' prisons are filled with men and women intellectually fit. Every crook and vagabond could stand your literacy test and your best examination. I do not think that proves anything at all.

I sat here and listened to the eloquent tongue of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. He talked about the horde as the scum of the earth. We have been receiving immigrants for many years in this country, and we have had so small a percentage of what we could term horde and scum that it is infinitesimal. It comes with ill grace for a Senator in this free, democratic land, that hangs out the latchstring to the downtrodden and oppressed of all the world, to talk about horde and scum. Thank God, my grandfather came from France and my mother, who bore me, came directly from Germany. Mayhap they would not have been able to pass your test, and I defy such an insinuation as contemptible, un-American; yes, worse.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly. I talk earnestly, but you know I love you all.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator, of course, understood that I referred to certain people who deserve that appellation from their sworn evidence. I referred to them generally.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I accept the Senator's apology.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is no apology at all.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I know the Senator did not mean to apply it to me at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly I did not.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to say something about the voting test. The alien has to live here for some time before he can have granted to him the privilege of a vote. So he will have realized and learned something of the blessings that come from this free land and then is better able to exercise the privilege of voting.

But here you would bar a man or woman because of their misfortune that they could not read. As I said a day or two ago, it is unholy in that it does not treat mankind as brother. It is unjust in that you deny mankind equal privileges. I would bar the infirm, I would bar those who are unclean; but with moral minds, clean bodies, I would open the door and let our public-school system assimilate and adjust them.

I heard a list of percentages in the various States given. As I ran down the gamut I found that New Jersey had 26 per cent foreign born, and 14 per cent, I think, of that 26 per cent were illiterate. Yet we are not here asking your favor to put up the bars. New Jersey, glorious and proud in her recent history, proud in her Revolutionary history, and proud in her position to-day, asks no odds or favor of Georgia or of any other Commonwealth.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator speak for both Senators from New Jersey?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am speaking for myself, and I speak in part for New Jersey. I say that New Jersey has 26 per cent, and yet with this unholy horror in New Jersey we have multiplied in wealth in an appalling degree. It would stagger you Georgians to realize it. In building of public institutions, in mills and workshops, in banks and happy homes and general prosperity we can pass with any Commonwealth in this Union. I have wandered across the plains of Georgia, and I have seen her hills and dales and hollows. That part of the country the God of humanity has blessed beyond parallel. Look at the plains in Georgia, in Mississippi, and in South Carolina, and then look at those in New Jersey and see how richly blessed are the latter. They are what yours might be if the same class of immigrants should settle within your domain as have settled in the Commonwealth of New Jersey. Our dunes, that for years were drifted sand, are occupied by great colonies of Italians and Germans and Jews, who have cultivated the soil until to-day they are dotted with happy homes and are the picture of thrift and of industry.

When the story is told here of Italians coming to this land and earning a few dollars and then departing, I say God speed them. I do not envy, nor does the Senator in his own heart, any poor Italian who has gathered together through dint of perseverance and frugality and honesty a few hundred or mayhap a thousand dollars. I have seen hundreds of them coming to my Commonwealth and to the great city of New York who, through perseverance and accumulation, have gathered together a little fortune, and God knows I do not envy them. I have seen them delve 12 and 15 feet in sewers and in the great subways and in caissons for the foundations of great bridges that span our rivers. I have seen them taking their lives in their hands, working in a stifling atmosphere where it was almost impossible to exist and in conditions too horrifying to contemplate. They have earned a dollar and a half, mayhap, sometimes $1.60 a day. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] told us yesterday that they average a wage of $1.25. I say the man would be un-American and inhuman who would be jealous or envious of these poor fellows who may have carried their little money away that they have gathered together.

This stamp of illiteracy is akin to the old talk of property qualification. They are twin brothers; they go hand in hand. In many States the property qualification formerly existed. I believe it is only very recently that the last one—Rhode Island—abolished the property qualification. Only two or three days ago Louis Windmuller died. Everybody in our part of the country knew of him, and he was known generally throughout the country. He came to this land from Germany. He had but a dollar. It is not said that he was illiterate, but it is probable that he would not have passed the qualifications that are required by the bill. He became the most respected and honored citizen in New York. He gathered together great wealth and died with a fortune of nearly $700,000. He grew to be quite cultured in matters of public debate and questions relating to the general welfare in the civic community. He was an honored citizen and a blessed and a most sterling monument to his race and to his adopted American citizenship.

I say that this qualification and the property qualification are both in keeping, one with the other. They are of the same kind and breed, of the same fold.

The distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] found great delight a day or two ago when I was making some remarks on this subject, as to which I feel keenly. He said it was enfantillage—he called it "sentimentalism." Yes, thank God, I am full of sentimentalism; I am full of sentiment. I would not take it out if I could, and I could not if I would. Sentiment to humanity is what the blossom is to the vine. The Senator, too, is brimful of sentiment when it suits his line of argument; but when it does not, he turns his back on it in disgust and would ridicule it. Oh, yes; you can not take it out of me. My sentiment is love of my country. I love its institutions and I will do all I can to advance its welfare.

I want to vote for an immigration bill, but I want an immigration bill that shall have in its requirements cleanly bodies, moral minds, industrious and holy purposes. Beyond that I care not. I will leave the great public school institutions to assimilate those men and to infuse red blood into the veins of many who, God knows, need it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I did not hear all of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but I think that one of the corrections that he made in the interest of historical accuracy was aimed at what he thought I had said. I think the Senator from Mississippi understood me to say that Thomas A. Edison was of foreign birth.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I understood the Senator to say, at the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey, that he was a German.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I beg the Senator's pardon. I said that very many of his associates were Germans.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh.

Mr. REED. This is what I said, and the RECORD will show it; the Senator from Mississippi simply did not hear correctly:

> My attention has just been called by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] to the fact that many of those men who are now rendering great assistance to Thomas A. Edison in his wonderful inventions are Germans, who came here and secured employment with him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Frankness compels me to say that I did not hear it that way. It is, of course, as the Senator states it. I remember distinctly the Senator from New Jersey said something to him about Edison being a German, or something of that sort, and I shook my head at the Senator from Missouri to keep him from making the mistake; and I understood him to go ahead and make it, anyway. It now seems that what the Senator from Missouri did say was something with which I have no sort of historical quarrel at all. It was the fault of my right ear, Mr. President, which happens to be my wrong ear. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator for keeping watch and ward, but even in this instance he did not hear correctly. I trust he will continue to supervise my conduct so that I shall be kept free from mistakes in the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I can not undertake that charge. The proposed task is too great for me. [Laughter.] That reminds me a good deal, if I were to accept that charge, of the prayer that Parson Brownlow delivered in Greeneville, Tenn.——

Mr. REED. If I might interrupt the anecdote, if it is a task that the Senator from Mississippi recognizes as beyond his ability, it is the first time I have ever seen him in that situation. I am glad that my ignorance and incapacity are so great that they have arrested the Senator and caused him to conclude there is something he can not quite correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, you and the Senate may think that the Senator from Missouri intended that last remark seriously on its own account, but the Senator did not. He merely intended to keep me from telling the anecdote which I was about to tell; that was all. [Laughter.] The Senator is one of the most malicious men, when he does become malicious, that I have ever known; and the most malicious thing in the world that a man can do is to interrupt another man just in the initial proceeding of telling an anecdote.

I was about to say that if I undertook to correct all the errors made by the Senator from Missouri, especially his political errors during some recent times, I might have before me a task similar to that suggested by this story, which Senators may apply for themselves.

It is said that Parson Brownlow, being entertained at one time at the house of old Dr. Sandy Williams, in the neighborhood of Greeneville, Tenn., and being a man "powerful in prayer," was called upon by Dr. Sandy late at night to lead in prayer before the gentlemen took their last nightcap and went to sleep, and Parson Brownlow arose and prayed. He prayed for men of all sorts and conditions; he prayed for the ignorant and the learned; for the wise and the unwise; for the rich and the poor; for the white and the black; and Parson Brownlow, being an old-line Whig, Dr. Sandy Williams being one, and a very distinguished but recently defeated Whig candidate for governor, Meredith P. Gentry, being present, and having recently been defeated by Andrew Johnson for that great office in the State of Tennessee, and having after that time suffered the death of his wife, and in consequence both of his defeat and the death of his wife having gone into a sort of a decline, and the party having been given for the purpose of making him forget his woes, this distinguished man was there, too, and was kneeling by the sofa. As Parson Brownlow's prayer became more and more affecting and more and more pathetic there could be heard audible sobs coming from the sofa, until finally Brownlow, thinking he would go even further, said: "And I pray Thee, O Lord, if in Thy infinite wisdom it be possible, for mercy, too, upon John M. Savage"—who was at that time the chairman of the Democratic executive committee of the State of Tennessee—"and upon Andrew Johnson—even upon them." About that time this distinguished statesman who had been very much affected, even to tears, rose and said: "Parson, stop right there. Do not ask too much. You will exhaust the fount of infinite mercy." [Laughter.]

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I understand that the pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I should like to ask the Chair if that is the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana is correct.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, while I favor the literacy provision of the immigration bill for reasons which I may very briefly state at a future stage of the discussion on the bill, I also favor the amendment now pending because of my unwillingness to debar from this country any who seek it as an asylum from either religious or political persecution. I have some misgivings that the privilege thus given, if it is given, may to some extent be abused; but I would rather that some did abuse it than to debar all.

I understand that this amendment is principally intended for the benefit of the Jews who live in certain countries in Europe, and I shall vote for the amendment with that understanding. I do not see any reason for the insertion of the word "racial" in the amendment, believing that the words "religious or political persecution" are sufficiently comprehensive to fully cover the case, yet I see no particular objection to the insertion of the word "racial."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado as modified.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood in voting on this proposed amendment that the very object of the literacy test will be nullified if the amendment is adopted. At another time I have explained fully why the committee saw fit to repeat what previous committees have done by inserting the word "solely" before the words "religious persecution," and I hope it will be thoroughly understood that to introduce the words "political and racial" will practically nullify the object sought to be attained. In my judgment, to strike out the word "solely" and insert the words "political and racial" will be equivalent to inviting the whole world in, and will nullify the literacy test. With that explanation, I am ready to go to a vote on the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Question!

Mr. REED. Mr. President I ask that the amendment as modified be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 9, beginning in line 6, it is proposed to strike out:

That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they emigrated from the country of which they were last permanent residents solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the following classes of persons, when otherwise qualified for admission under the laws of the United States, shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious, political, or racial persecution, whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish to say just a word or two. In the first place, the matter to which I shall direct the attention of the Senate may be considered somewhat technical, although I think it should be corrected. The amendment as it reads now provides that the immigrants shall prove that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious persecution, and so forth. That is going to force the immigrant into statements ofttimes that may not be strictly correct. He is coming from the country of which he was last a resident because of religious or political persecution. He could go to Canada, to England, to France, to Germany, or to other countries so far as escaping persecution is concerned. He leaves to escape that, and comes here, of course, because of all the asylums to which he may flee he prefers this country. It seems to me that that language should be corrected.

While I am on my feet I want to say a word in regard to this amendment. I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss the question of literacy as a test for admission to this country. It is a test according to the conditions under which a man has grown up. It may well be said that a man who grows to manhood in this country, with all the opportunities for education it affords, and is illiterate, lacks that spirit, that sentiment, and that temperament that will bring him best in harmony with the spirit of our institutions; but to say of the man who has had no opportunity to acquire an education that the lack of that education is evidence of his wanting in those things which would bring him in harmony with the spirit of our institutions is not accurate or fair.

I am not going to say anything concerning those immigrants who have come to this country. We have grown great under the system that we have pursued. Nor am I going to take the time of the Senate to discuss the people to whom this particular amendment is held out as a hope. Their history spells tragedy. More than that, we should remember that, either under a Divine purpose or under laws established, while their history spells tragedy to themselves it has spelled tragedy to their oppressors, because they have lived to see the downfall and the passing away of almost every race which ever oppressed them.

They come to this country and they make good citizens. They seldom appear at the almshouse and seldom appear in a court of justice in response to a criminal prosecution. They come from countries where they have not had an opportunity to secure an education. Now it is urged that we must change our policy and no longer admit that our country shall be an asylum; that we shall regulate our immigration laws without any regard to the principle of asylum; but, Mr. President, this bill in the very form it passed the House and in the form in which it is reported to the Senate by the committee concedes the principle of asylum on our shores to the oppressed. If this exception to the literacy clause means anything, if it is any more than an empty hope held out to oppressed people, it means that in their case, where they do flee from oppression, we recognize the asylum principle regardless of the literacy test. So we have the verdict of the House and we have the verdict of the Senate committee that we should recognize the principle of asylum within certain degrees.

The Senator from Mississippi, who has spoken so strongly against the thought of asylum, has offered an amendment here that carries the spirit of asylum in its very terms, because he proposes to make an exception to this rule further to those people who, because of the military occupation of their country by a foreign power, no longer live under the Government under which they formerly lived. Without regard to literacy they are to be admitted here. There is the admission that we still retain, and that, born of an instinct of justice and humanity, we ought to retain, the spirit and sentiment of asylum in our immigration laws.

I am in favor of the amendment, because ever since it has been my privilege to sit in this Chamber I have believed in one thing, and have been consistent in my belief and in my practice. I believe that when we pass legislation we should make legislation plain, so that it can be understood, so that it can be interpreted, and so that there will be the least possible difference of opinion as to its meaning and its interpretation. If it is the sentiment of the House, if it is the sentiment of the Senate committee, that we should recognize the principle of asylum in our immigration laws to the extent of admitting those who flee from religious persecution, we should recognize that in the policy of foreign Governments it is almost impossible to distinguish between that which comes from religious or political or racial persecution. We can not say of the unfortunate Jews in foreign countries whether it is religious, whether it is political, or whether it is racial; but we pretend here to hold out to these oppressed people the hope that in their oppression is to be found an exception to our literacy test and a recognition that somewhere, under certain limitations, we recognize the principle of asylum in our immigration laws.

That being true, Mr. President, we should hold out to them no false hopes. We should pass no law here that will simply lead to confusion in interpretation and in distinguishing what is meant and intended by the law. Then let us be plain and fair. Let us act aboveboard in this matter. We have back of us at this moment the action of the House and the Senate committee in recognizing that we should somewhere permit the asylum principle in our immigration laws. It is plain from the language of the bill that this hope is held out to a particular race. Then let us make it plain. Let us be fair and candid, and leave no ground for discussion or difference of opinion as to what the provision means. Recognizing that the oppression of the Jewish people in these foreign countries is born of an intermingling of religious, racial, and political motives and purposes, let us include all three in the exception in order that we may not hold out to them simply an empty hope.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. WORKS. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that the difficulty about this amendment is that it is not dependent upon the fact that these people are persecuted, but upon a mere statement made by them to that effect; and it will be a very easy matter for these illiterate people from all sections of the world to come in upon a mere statement of that kind when it is perfectly well known that there is no such persecution in the country from which they come. I think it should depend upon the existence of the fact that the Senator is talking about and not upon a mere statement by the party who is seeking to come in.

Mr. CLAPP. Why, Mr. President, that goes to the mechanism of this bill. The bill provides that they shall prove, to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officers, the existence of these facts. If the bill does not make abundant provision for that proof, that is another question and a separate question for discussion and dealing. That goes, as I say, to the mechanism. I am discussing now the exception itself. As these three conditions—religious, political, and racial—are so interwoven, I believe we should make this language plain and put it beyond controversy, and include the three terms in the exception, so that when the Jew fleeing from oppression abroad comes to these shores he will not be confronted with any effort at technical distinction between religious, racial, and political oppression.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Overman	Smoot
Brady	Hardwick	Page	Swanson
Burton	Hughes	Reed	Thomas
Clapp	Kern	Sheppard	Thornton
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Simmons	White
Cummins	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Gallinger	Lodge	Smith, Ga.	Works
Gore	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.

Mr. THORNTON. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is absent on public business, and that he is paired with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. BRADY. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is absent on official duty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary proceeded to call the names of absent Senators.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m., Wednesday, December 30, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, December 31, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 30, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee, Almighty God, our heavenly Father, for our Republic and all its sacred institutions, for its national integrity and unity, and we most fervently pray for all who are called to minister to its genius that they may be inspired by the highest, purest, and most patriotic motives, that it may continue to grow in its intellectual, moral, and spiritual life to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce discharged from the consideration of the following bills, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. My opinion is that they should go to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

Bill S. 6782, to provide for the appointment of certain assistant inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, at ports where they are actually performing duty, but to which they are at present detailed, in my opinion, belongs to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, as it relates to the navigation laws, and all bills of that character, since I have been a member of the committee, have been referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 6781, to provide for the appointment of 11 supervising inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, in lieu of 10, is an amendment to the Steamboat-Inspection Service law.

H. R. 20281, to provide for the appointment of certain assistant inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, at ports where they are actually performing duty, but to which they are at present detailed. That is a companion bill to the bill S. 6782.

Also the bill H. R. 20282, to provide for the appointment of 11 supervising inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, in lieu of 10.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent that these bills be referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged and that these bills be referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be greedy and ask jurisdiction which does not belong to us, and neither do I wish to see any further progress made in this gradual diminution of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If I am wrong in insisting that the Steamboat-Inspection Service bills have always been under the jurisdiction of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois, the former chairman of the committee, if that is not the fact of the case?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, nearly all of these bills relating to the Steamboat-Inspection Service and the dimensions of vessels used to go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Many of them have recently been referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which I think now it is understood has jurisdiction. As to these particular bills, I do not know.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Prior to the establishment of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries all bills on this subject were considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but long after the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was created bills requiring certain dimensions in vessels and bills for steamboat inspection were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, at the time when Gen. Grosvenor was chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Some were designedly afterwards sent to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries because the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce did not desire to retain jurisdiction of those matters.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am individually concerned, I think the line of demarcation between the jurisdiction of committees has been left rather shadowy on purpose, so that the Speaker might give such direction as to equalize the work. I realize that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has a great deal to do and that some other committees have less to do, and individually I have no objection to their taking some of the work, and yet I do not wish to advocate a diminution of the importance and dignity of that committee. I am not going to ask that it be given to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, because I do not want to get rid of the work, but I am not going to object to the change, in view of what the gentleman from Illinois has just said.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that there are three committees in this House that it would puzzle King Solomon himself, if he should return, to say to which committee sometimes a bill ought to be sent—the Judiciary Committee with reference to antitrust bills, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The fact is they interfere with each other sometimes in the lines of jurisdiction. If the Chair has ever discriminated in favor of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries on some shadowy question as against the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it was simply because the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has more work to do than any other committee in this House, and does it.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the way I understand it; and I wish to state for the benefit of the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Mr. ALEXANDER, for whom I have the highest appreciation, that I do not think we have shed as much business that rightfully belongs to us to that committee as we have to some other committees.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that this is not a conflict between the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and myself as to jurisdiction. The Senate bills were referred to the Committee on Commerce in the Senate, which has jurisdiction of the same subject matter as has the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and since I have been a member of the committee they have gone to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. There is no conflict between the chairmen of these two committees. There is a conflict in the principle upon which these bills are referred. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

By direction of the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. LEVER reported the bill (H. R. 20415) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report (No. 1255), referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois reserves all points of order on the bill.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TAGGART rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I rise in reply to an attack that has been made upon me in a publication known as Harper's Weekly, a copy of which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that the article referred to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From Harper's Weekly for December 26, 1914.]

POLITICS AND JUSTICE.

Kansas is always interesting. It is so lively, individual, and American. Now, be it understood that the editor of the Fort Scott Tribune, George W. Marble by name, is a credit to journalism. He is straight, conscientious, brave. Incidentally he was effective for Mr. Wilson at a time when friends were needed. He was one of the original Wilson men.

JOSEPH TAGGART, Member of Congress, is a Democrat from the second Kansas district. A few months ago Marble printed the charge that TAGGART, who rather makes us tired, was selling post offices on a commission basis in his district. During the recent campaign post-office inspectors were sent out to investigate the charges. TAGGART was whitewashed. As to that side of it we say nothing. The evidence is not before us, and our opinion is therefore only a surmise based on the characters of the men involved. But the inspectors did more. They attacked Marble's character, blackmail is being charged in print against him, and the report is presumably on file in the Post Office Department. If so, it should be expunged. It is displeasing to see the reputation of an honest editor smirched for the convenience of a far-from-desirable Congressman.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, the writer of this article is evidently suffering prematurely from a spring condition. He could be readily relieved with rhubarb and sassafras tea. If his mind is in the condition where it acts without evidence and he arrives at conclusions without being able to give any reason why, he is singularly fortunate that he has never lived in the State of Kansas. If a man were in that condition in the State of Kansas, with his mind reaching conclusions without any kind of evidence before him, he would be promptly put under guardianship in that distinctly American State, and possibly placed in one of the two very excellent institutions provided there for the treatment of that kind of malady. It is also fortunate for him that he never let his erring footsteps stray as far as the great State of Texas, the home of the Postmaster General. If he should find himself there, he would at once come to the conclusion that he would better be circumspect before he became sarcastic. If he had gone down to the State of Virginia, the birthplace of our great President and of six other great Presidents, and had made a practice of attacking public men without any evidence before him, I think I can safely say that he would not keep at it long until his career would terminate in a very interesting coroner's inquest.

As far as the Kansas editor is concerned, there is only a word to say about him. The article says that he was an original Wilson man. I believe I heard it said that his puny efforts were put forth in behalf of the distinguished governor of New Jersey. The result of his efforts was that a unanimous delegation for the distinguished Speaker of this House was sent to the State convention from his county with instructions to continue to vote for the Speaker until the State convention agreed to send delegates to Baltimore in his behalf. This is what he did for Mr. Wilson "at a time when friends were needed." It is unnecessary to mention him any further than to say that I do not think he is now in a position to attack anybody. He used to be a clever and effective liar before he lost what little reputation for truth and veracity he deceived the people into thinking he had; but now I do not believe that, outside of fly time, when he could cooperate with millions of others, he could cause annoyance to any public man.

This article has the merit of being one of the queerest screeds ever published in a well-known magazine. The man who wrote it did not even know how to spell my obscure and undistinguished name. The man who wrote it did not even give correctly the name of the obscure paper published 1,500 miles away from his office. I never had what certainly might have been the pleasure of meeting the editor of this magazine. I know that he never did me the honor of even looking at me; and yet he has decided a controversy between me and another man, both of whom live 1,500 miles away from New York. The Post Office Department decided the matter with the evidence before it; the New York editor decided it without the evidence before him.

Let me trespass on your patience long enough to say that I led the ticket in the second district of Kansas—the State and National ticket both—by some thousands of votes; and if I, whom he says is far from desirable, am the favorite in the most prosperous district in the United States, what is wrong with the excellent gentlemen who were on the same ticket with me?

I also had the happiness of leading the ticket in 1912 by some 4,000 votes, and I say this in defense of those excellent people who were presented on the State and National tickets in that district. This New York editor is not decent enough to allow a constituency of 100,000 men and women voters to decide whether I am desirable or undesirable. He has decided the question in New York City.

This is the Christmas number of the magazine, and I want to call the attention of the House to the leading caricature that is in the middle of it—an insult to the 30,000,000 of people of German blood in the United States, the brave people who live in nearly every State in this Union, who control every doubtful State in national elections, and who own more than half of the property in the Northern States. And yet the Christmas greeting to them is a caricature of a German soldier breaking in the door of a humble cottage with the butt of his rifle with intent to commit murder. And this is labeled with an ancient and holy name, "Kris Kringle," a little German child's way of saying in German the name of the Christ child. I want the people of that heroic blood who may take the trouble to read my remarks to go to the public library in whatever town they reside and call for this magazine and look at the blasphemous and horrible Chrismas greeting that it has offered to one-third of the American people. I want to say that if there was a crayon artist among the Members of this House, and he would bring in materials here and proceed to caricature any brave people or any soldier who is fighting for his country in the snows of Europe at this time, and hold him and his people, and the tenderest sentiments of their hearts, up to ridicule and contempt, I would vote to expel him from this House of Representatives. This is a neutral Nation, and this is a neutral House of Representatives. We in the House are requested by the highest authority to keep our mouths shut about this war, and yet the editor of one of these publications can insult the most industrious and prosperous part of our people, and not only insult them, but convince them that he and hundreds of others, on account of their manifest partiality in favor of one empire as against another, are in the pay of one of the belligerents. I hope this partiality will not continue until we wake up some morning and find this Nation aflame with anger.

Mr. Speaker, I have little more to say. I shall conclude by saying this much, that this Harper's Weekly and other advertising agencies like it are delivered to the American people as second-class mail matter at a loss to the Government of $40,000,000 and more annually, and that it is violating the spirit of American neutrality at the public expense. It would be better for any public man to have a typical case of smallpox as an inducement to popularity than the support of any such publication as this. [Applause.]

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19906, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eleven Members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 221 Members, a quorum, answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of dangerous illness of his father.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19906, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19906, with Mr. FERRIS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19906, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will indulge the Chair for a moment. On yesterday the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] offered, on page 10, line 4, the following amendment:

Provided, That in the appointment of superintendents of finance, superintendents of mails, superintendents of delivery, auditors, cashiers, or their assistants, such appointments shall be made, so far as may be, from assistant postmasters now serving, and in the offices where now serving, when otherwise qualified.

A point of order was made against the amendment by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. The Chair sustained the point of order against that amendment. A moment later a parliamentary inquiry was submitted by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] to know if the Chair was going to hold that all amendments to these specific items of legislation contained in the special rule would be held out of order. Of course that question was not at that time squarely before the Chair for decision, but the Chair, attempting to answer the gentleman in order to expedite things as he then thought, in substance said that it was the Chair's opinion that the special rule should be strictly construed and that the rule did not go further than it on its face purported to go, and the Chair thought at that time he was applying the correct course of reasoning to the case. He thinks at this time he applied the correct course of reasoning, but upon consulting some of the parliamentarians of the House who know more about parliamentary law than the Chair does, the Chair in that instance was in error and he would like to have the RECORD show a correction to that extent. The Chair does not desire to make a change of ruling in reference to the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, but he does desire to add to the ruling then made that he thinks the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is not germane to the proposition, inasmuch as the Chair thinks it purports to create a kind of an eligible list by a limitation in the method of making these appointments which is not prescribed either by the special rule or would be in order under the general rules of the House; and that will be the ruling of the Chair this morning.

Mr. STEENERSON. The Chair yesterday ruled that it was out of order because it was new legislation, but now the Chair retracts that part, placing it on the ground that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just stated what the ruling was. Unless there is some motion pending the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Stenographers, clerks in charge, and clerks, 18,500, at not exceeding $1,200 each.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. There was an appeal from the decision of the Chair pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There was. Does the gentleman care to have the appeal put at this time?

Mr. STEENERSON. I presume that is the order of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized to move to appeal from the decision of the Chair if it is desired.

Mr. MANN. The appeal is already pending and must be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought it fair to the Chair if the gentleman wants to move the appeal in face of the amended ruling.

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to say, in face of the amended ruling, that I think it is a serious question as to whether the Chair is correct, but it has considerably improved the situation so far as the Chair is concerned. A precedent cited in the Book of Rules, volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 3823, page 553, seems to be almost parallel to the case of the gentleman from Iowa. There the appropriation bill provided for a reorganization of the employees of the Library of Congress, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] offered as an amendment to that reorganization provision the following:

All the above appointments, except the Librarian and two assistants, are to be made from lists of eligibles to be submitted by the Civil Service Commission, under their rules, who are hereby empowered to hold examinations for all of the above positions.

Mr. William A. Stone, of Pennsylvania, made the point of order that the amendment changed existing law.

After debate, the Chairman ruled:

This bill when reported to the House contained, in the paragraph relating to the Library of Congress, that which is manifestly on its face new legislation. This would have been subject to a point of order under the provisions of Rule XXI, section 2. No such point of order was made, and the bill therefore was sent by the House to the Committee of the Whole for consideration just as it was reported and in its entirety. Under these circumstances, as has been heretofore several times ruled, no point of order could be made in the committee against the paragraph on the ground that it contained new legislation. The committee, in other words, could not refuse to consider what the House had sent to it for consideration. But the right of consideration involves also the right of amendment; that is to say, the committee has the right to perfect as it may see fit the matter submitted to it. For these reasons the point of order is overruled.

The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], which is as follows—

"Provided, That in the appointment of superintendents of finance, superintendents of mails, superintendents of delivery, auditors, cashiers, or their assistants, such appointments shall be made, so far as may be, from assistant postmasters now serving, and in the offices where now serving, when otherwise qualified"—

is analogous to the amendment referred to at that time, offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, when it was held in order, and I believe that the ruling of the Chair as amended is not justified by the facts. I am not particular about this, but it seems to me that the committee ought to have a chance to go on record as to whether or not they want these assistant postmasters to have the preference in the filling of these new places created by these various paragraphs to which the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa applies, and for that reason I think we ought to have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the appeal comes too late. The Clerk had begun to read the next section, and had read a portion of the bill when the appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks we should not adopt that course. The appeal was taken last night.

Mr. MANN. The appeal was taken last night in the absence of my friend from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman from Indiana was here last night, and is well aware of what took place then. He was then, as usual, present, attending to his duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no disposition to take advantage of a technicality. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At each post office where the receipts are $40,000 but less than $60,000: Superintendent of finance, $1,300; superintendent of mails, $1,300.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Shall we treat these as one paragraph, or wait until the Clerk is through reading and take up each as a separate paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair held yesterday that each one was a separate paragraph, and each one could have an amendment offered to it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the salary of the superintendent of finance and the superintendent of mail under the present law where the receipts are $40,000 but less than $60,000?

Mr. MADDEN. Thirteen hundred dollars.

Mr. WINGO. There is no change, then?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. WINGO. I will say to the chairman of the committee that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] advises there is no change.

Mr. MADDEN. No change.

Mr. WINGO. Is that true with reference to all of these?

Mr. MADDEN. Practically true.

Mr. WINGO. Is there any change in the next paragraph, "Offices of $60,000 but less than $100,000 and $100,000 but less than $150,000"? Is there any change in those two?

Mr. MADDEN. Practically no changes.

Mr. MOON. If there are any changes, they are in the $3,600 and $3,800, and then we go back to the $3,200 and $3,400, and so forth.

Mr. WINGO. I was under the impression that the salary of the superintendent of mails in the office of $100,000 and over was $1,700 or $1,800 now. I was not sure of that, and if that be true, then this will be a reduction here of $200. The chairman thinks there is no reduction in those salaries.

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas, there is no reduction at all. If there is anything at all, it is an increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At each post office where the receipts are $20,000,000 or over: Superintendent of finance, $3,800; cashiers, $2,800; superintendent of mails, $3,800; assistant superintendents of mails, $2,400, $2,600, and $2,800; superintendent of delivery, $3,800; assistant superintendents of delivery, $2,400, $2,600, and $2,800; stenographers, $900 to $1,200; bookkeeper, $2,400; auditor, $3,000: And provided further, That there may also be employed at first-class post offices special clerks, foremen, and stenographers, at a salary of $1,300 or more per annum, the total number at any post office not to exceed 1 at $1,300 for each $100,000 receipts; 1 at $1,400 for each $200,000 receipts; 1 at $1,500 for each $400,000 receipts; 1 at $1,600 for each $800,000 receipts; 1 at $1,700 for each $1,500,000 receipts; 1 at $1,800 for each $3,000,000 receipts; 1 at $1,900 for each $6,000,000 receipts; and 1 at $2,000 for each $12,000,000 receipts: And provided further, That on and after July 1, 1915, the salary of station superintendents shall be based on the postal receipts and number of employees at their respective stations on the following basis:

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 3, strike out all after the word "annum" down to and including the word "receipts," on line 10, and insert a colon.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. This, Mr. Chairman, has the approval of the committee, and simply leaves this condition: Under the present regulations special clerks are promoted on the basis of $80,000 receipts—one special clerk for each $80,000 in receipts. It is now proposed to make it permanent law and the basis of promotion $100,000 in receipts. It is the opinion of the committee that the law should remain as it is, leaving it optional with the department to make the promotions on the present basis. Therefore this amendment is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY], who has just taken his seat, whether the only change made is the reduction of $100,000 to $80,000?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. While I am on the floor I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. On page 13, from line 19 down to the proviso on line 25, are there any changes there in the salaries of these respectively named officials?

Mr. MOON. I think not. They are all carried through in the same way.

Mr. GOULDEN. The only change is that the superintendent of finance and the superintendent of mails are placed at $3,800; and if the assistant postmaster becomes one of those officers he loses $200?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. That I understand. Are there any other changes, reductions, or advances in the different items?

Mr. MOON. No. If the gentleman wants to compare the old law with the new——

Mr. GOULDEN. No. I simply want to know if there are any reductions in the salaries in the various officials named in the paragraph. If so, I shall oppose the adoption of the paragraph.

Mr. MOON. None except those mentioned.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is what I wanted to ascertain before permitting it to pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

When the employees (clerks and carriers, city and rural) at a carrier station are three or less, the station shall have a credit of one point, and for each multiple of three employees a credit of one point.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I assume from the reading that these two paragraphs giving credit of certain points are cumulative?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I will explain that if the chairman of the committee will allow me. Stations having a $1,300 man in charge would be based on a credit of six points, and a station having $5,000 receipts or less, with six employees, or $10,000 receipts and three employees, would be entitled to five and six points.

Mr. MANN. The points under receipts and the points under number of employees are cumulative?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. I will explain the whole thing.

Mr. MANN. I see.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to explain it for the benefit of the rest of the committee. Stations with credits of 5 to 6 points would be entitled to a superintendent at $1,300 a year, and in stations having $5,000 receipts or less and 6 employees, or $10,000 receipts and 3 employees, would be within the class of 5 to 6 points.

Stations having $15,000 receipts and 6 employees, or $10,000 receipts and 9 employees, would be within the class of 7 to 9 points, and the superintendent would get $1,400 a year.

Stations with $25,000 receipts and 9 employees, or $30,000 receipts and 6 employees, would be within the 10 to 13 points, and the superintendent would get $1,500 a year.

Stations receiving $45,000 receipts and 9 employees, or $40,000 receipts and 12 employees, or $50,000 receipts and 6 employees, would come within the points 14 to 18, and would be entitled to a superintendent at $1,600 a year.

Within points 19 to 23, the $1,700 class, the receipts would have to be $70,000 and 9 employees, or $75,000 receipts and 6 employees, or $65,000 receipts and 12 employees, in order to make the position worth $1,700 a year.

Stations with receipts of $100,000 and 6 employees, or $95,000 receipts and 9 employees, or $90,000 receipts and 12 employees, or $85,000 receipts and 15 employees, would be within the points 24 to 32, and would be entitled to $1,800 a year for the superintendent.

Stations with receipts of $150,000 and 6 employees, or with receipts of $145,000 and 9 employees, or receipts of $140,000 and 12 employees, or receipts of $135,000 and 15 employees, would be within points 33 to 44, and the salary of the superintendent would be $1,900.

Stations with receipts of $200,000 and 6 employees, or $195,000 and 9 employees, or $190,000 and 12 employees, or $185,000 and 15 employees, would come within the class 45 to 64 points, and the salary of the superintendent would amount to $2,000.

Stations having receipts of $300,000 and 6 employees, or $295,000 and 9 employees, or $290,000 and 12 employees, or $285,000 and 15 employees, would come within the 65 to 100 points, and the salary would be $2,100.

Stations with receipts of $475,000 and 12 employees, or $470,000 and 15 employees, or $465,000 and 18 employees, or $460,000 and 21 employees, would come within 101 to 135 points, and the salary of the superintendent would be $2,200 under this schedule.

Stations with receipts of $660,000 and 6 employees, or $655,000 and 9 employees, or $650,000 and 12 employees, or $645,000 and 15 employees, would come within 136 to 200 points, and the salary would be $2,300, and so on.

At stations where the receipts are light and the number of men is large the salary would be based on one point for every three employees, as they are in all these cases. So, for example, if there were 200 men employed at the station, as there are in many of the stations in Chicago and New York, and the receipts amounted to only $5,000, the superintendent of such a station would be entitled to 66 points for the 200 men, 1 point for every 3 men and 5 for the receipts, making him 71 points, and that would make the man who was acting as superintendent of a station employing 200 men where the receipts were only $5,000 come within the class where the superintendent's compensation would be $2,100 a year.

I think that explanation covers the whole thing, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At stations having a total credit of 5 points or more the salary of the superintendent shall be as follows: Five and 6 points, superintendent, $1,300; 7 to 9 points, superintendent, $1,400; 10 to 13 points, superintendent, $1,500; 14 to 18 points, superintendent, $1,600; 19 to 23 points, superintendent, $1,700; 24 to 32 points, superintendent, $1,800; 33 to 44 points, superintendent, $1,900; 45 to 64 points, superintendent, $2,000; 65 to 100 points, superintendent, $2,100; 101 to 135 points, superintendent, $2,200; 136 to 200 points, superintendent, $2,300; 201 to 275 points, superintendent, $2,400; 276 to 350 points, superintendent, $2,500; 351 points and over, superintendent, $2,600.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, after line 17, insert the following:
"Provided, That because of the reclassification plan herein provided no employee shall receive less compensation than before the passage of this act."

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, the amendment explains itself, I think, without further comment.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to say "no employee" or "no office"?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. No employee affected by this legislation.

Mr. RUCKER. For personal service.

Mr. MANN. Possibly some employee might want to be transferred to some other place, and the question is whether he could be transferred at a lower salary. Of course if it only relates to the reorganization——

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. This reclassification is all it refers to.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understood that the purpose of this reorganization was in part to reduce salaries. Now, if this amendment——

Mr. STEENERSON. Let us have the amendment reported again.

Mr. CULLOP. In just a moment, when I finish my sentence. If this amendment should be adopted, then it would restore them all to the same salaries they had before the change or reorganization took place.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Not necessarily, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CULLOP. I should like to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is it proposed by this amendment to cover cashiers, superintendents, and all other employees?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. This amendment proposes to cover all those referred to in this reclassification proposition which has just been read.

Mr. CULLOP. But, Mr. Chairman, if this amendment was adopted, there could be no reduction in the salary of any employee of the office.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. There could be no reduction in the salaries of present employees.

Mr. CULLOP. There could be no reduction, and there might be cases in which a reduction would be essential. Hence, if this was adopted, it would prevent anything of that kind, and the minimum salaries must remain as they now are. There might be instances where reductions ought to be made, and others in which increases ought to be made. I am going to make a point of order against this amendment, since I have heard it read.

Mr. MANN. It is too late.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I think that it is too late, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Instead of saying "because," would it not be better to say "by reason of"?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I shall be glad to agree to any change in the phraseology that will improve it.

Mr. MANN. There might be quite a difference between the construction of "by reason of" and "because of." Of course what you mean is "by reason of."

Mr. CULLOP. This would relate to all the employees of the office, so far as a reduction is concerned.

Mr. MANN. No. "By reason of the reclassification no reduction shall be made" is plain enough.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I will accept that.

Mr. MANN. "By reason of the reclassification" means one thing. To say that there shall be no reduction because of the reclassification is an entirely different thing, and that is not what you intend.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. The distinction may be too fine for me, but I accept it.

Mr. CULLOP. Do you not intend by this amendment to affect only the employees who are affected by the reclassification?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Exactly.

Mr. CULLOP. This amendment affects all employees, and the reason given is because of the reclassification. It does not apply alone to the men who are affected by the reclassification, but to all. I am sure the gentleman from Connecticut does not intend it to be so broad as it really is.

Mr. MANN. But if you say no reduction shall be made by reason of the reclassification, that would not affect any other reductions which might be made irrespective of the reclassification.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. The intention is to have it affect only those referred to in this reclassification.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he make that change.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I ask that that change be made by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the exact change?

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. "By reason" instead of "because."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, since the amendment has been modified, let us have it reported again so that there will be no misunderstanding about it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, after line 17, insert the following:
"Provided, That by reason of the reclassification plan herein provided no employee shall receive less compensation than before the passage of this act."

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, that affects every employee in the office, without regard to whether his position has been affected by the reclassification or not. That is the meaning of that amendment, but the reason for it is given as because of the reclassification. But it is not confined to the officials who are affected only by the reclassification. Therefore, if adopted, it will affect every employee in the office.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How would it do supposing it read this way, "Provided, That no employee shall receive less compensation by reason of the reclassification plan herein provided for than before the passage of this act"?

Mr. CULLOP. That would still leave it as bad, if not worse, than it is now. If it is simply made to apply only to those employees who are affected by the reclassification, which doubtless it is intended to mean, it ought to plainly say so; but as it is now, it affects every employee in every post office, and that is my objection to it as it is now written. For this reason I think it ought to be defeated.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does not the gentleman think that this amendment is in harmony with the policy of the Post Office Department for economy, that the salaries shall be increased but not decreased?

Mr. CULLOP. I am not controlled in my action by those of any other individual. I say wherever an employee is rendering service worth more to the public than he is now receiving, he ought to have an increase; where an employee is rendering service not worth as much to the public as the salary he is now receiving, there ought to be a decrease in his salary. It ought to be measured by the real service that is being rendered to the public. Some of these men may be rendering a service that is worth more than they are now receiving, and others may be rendering a service that is worth not half as much as they are receiving. The pay always should be commensurate with the services rendered, and should be based on that principle alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CULLOP) there were 27 ayes and 5 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] be given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill. He is absent on account of sickness.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no allowance in excess of $300 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200; nor in excess of $400 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500; nor in excess of $500 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,600 or $1,700; nor in excess of $800 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900: And provided further, That in the disbursement of this appropriation no employee shall be paid at a rate higher than $600 per annum.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 16, line 14, by striking out the figures "300" and inserting "400."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention, if this amendment is agreed to, to offer an amendment increasing the maximum amount that may be allowed $100 in each class. The reason for it is that my investigation shows that in some third-class offices the clerical allowance is not sufficient to pay for the actual number of employees that are necessarily employed to do the work of the office. I think if there is any thing or any place where we are too economical it is the clerical allowance in the third-class offices. Take the highest amount of salary—$1,900—and the total amount is $800. You can not find a single third-class office where the assistant—he is practically an assistant postmaster, although not classified—where you can get a competent man for less than $900. I have not found a single office where you can get him, and my investigation has not been confined to my own district nor my own State. I have not found a single office where the postmaster is paying less than $25 a month out of his own pocket in order to obtain competent help.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The amount of the appropriation has been already passed.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; $1,700,000.

Mr. MANN. If this is increased in accordance with the gentleman's amendment, does anyone know the additional amount of appropriation that will be required?

Mr. WINGO. No; my amendment does not require that this amount shall be appropriated.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman expects that it will be made.

Mr. WINGO. It will be——

Mr. MANN. I am not saying that the amendment ought not to be adopted, but it will require an increased appropriation.

Mr. WINGO. It will require an increased appropriation, and I think economy at the expense of the service is poor economy. In some parts of the country it may be true that they do not use that much, but you can not find, as a rule, where they can get along with the present allowance.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman's amendment only relates to the classes between ten and eleven hundred dollars.

Mr. WINGO. That is my first amendment. If it is adopted, I intend to offer an additional amendment to each one of the classes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I presume the chairman will recollect how many third-class offices there are—some 5,000 or 6,000.

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes; more than that. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with my friend from Arkansas. I think this service is amply paid for and that the efficiency is in no way affected by the present allowance. I guarantee that I can fill every office in these third-class offices with a better man for the present salary.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not true, and has not the department so advised, that they have not in some instances been able to meet what appeared to be a legitimate demand for an increased allowance by reason of the limitation?

Mr. MOON. I do not know; that may be.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman think that in a town of 3,500 inhabitants, a county seat, with four railroads coming into it, you can get a competent man to handle the service for $800, where there is only one clerk with the postmaster?

Mr. MOON. Oh, there may be an isolated case of that sort where it can not be done, but I think generally it can be done. There is an unexpended balance on this item of $187,000.

Mr. WINGO. The reason of that is on account of this limitation; the department can not meet the merits of a particular situation because of this ironclad limit.

Mr. MOON. I do not think that is it. I think this is ample for the service. I do not believe this House ought to increase salaries and compensation along that line. I believe we are paying all that it is worth. The department thinks so, and they are the best judges. I would not want any man to perform services for less than the services were worth, but when there are hundreds and thousands of people clamoring for positions at a less salary I think it is out of order to undertake to increase them.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. In reference to what I inquired about, I find from the report that the number of third-class offices increased last year from 5,942 to 6,044, so that I was pretty nearly right.

Mr. MOON. Yes; I concede the gentleman is right about that. I did not take issue with him in regard to that.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then it would require about $600,000?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two in support of this amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to one class of offices where, I think, and, in fact, I know it is true in my district, the help in the office is underpaid. The salaries of the postmasters are predicated on the receipts of the office, and there is not a large city in the country that has not suburban post offices where a great number of the population work in the larger cities. For instance, I have three offices in my own district that are within 6, 7, and 8 miles of the city of Atlanta. A great volume of mail is handled for these suburban towns, but when stamps are to be purchased and letters are to be mailed, and when other items going to make up receipts of office are considered, the men folks of the families living in the suburbs usually buy their stamps in the city of Atlanta or bring them from their business institutions, and they mail the letters of the family in the large cities. Therefore the receipt of mail and the actual handling of mail in these suburban offices is much larger than the receipts of the office would indicate.

In my own town of Decatur, which is 6 miles from the city of Atlanta, the postmistress herself has to supplement the allowance of the department to get a person capable of doing the work in assisting her in the handling of the volume of mail. The same is true in College Park, 8 miles from the city of Atlanta. The postmistress there supplements the salary of her assistant to the extent of several dollars a month. Now, on the bare cold facts, as they are presented to the department, it would seem that these people are treated as justly as the other postmasters throughout the country, and I am making no complaint as to the Post Office Department, for it has allowed the maximum in each case, but as a matter of fact they are not allowed enough, because they do handle a greater volume of mail than the receipts of the office would show, and I think the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas ought to be adopted, and it should be left discretionary with the department for them to fix the amount, so that the department can meet the necessities of cases like those I have mentioned. I think the maximum amount ought to be increased $100 in each instance, and then we should leave it to the facts in the case with the department, and let them decide whether they would allow the additional hundred. I took this matter up a few weeks ago with the Chief of the Division of Salaries and Allowances, and in the case he allowed the maximum, but that amount was really insufficient. I think the maximum amount ought to be increased for the purpose of allowing the Postmaster General or the Chief of the Division of Salaries and Allowances to investigate cases of the character I have mentioned and say whether or not the postmaster would be justified in having a greater allowance given.

It must also be considered that since there has been any increase of the maximum for clerk hire the parcel post has been added to the service, which greatly increases the labors of postmasters and requires the employment in many instances of male help where formerly women were employed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 20, noes 29.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 16, strike out "$400" and insert "$500."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the figures given by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] are just about as erroneous as is his conception of the amendment offered. It will not require any $600,000, and any schoolboy can figure it will require only $60,000. The chairman of the committee says $180,000 remains of unexpended balance in this fund at the present time. That is an argument for increasing the maximum allowance. If you adopt my amendment it does not mean that the Post Office Department will be compelled to pay more, but it permits the Post Office Department to use that $180,000 where it could have used it this year, in cases where there is no question that it should be increased.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Not now. I want to finish this statement—yes; I will yield.

Mr. STEENERSON. Six thousand offices with an allowance of $100 each would amount to $600,000.

Mr. WINGO. Six thousand times 100 would be 600,000; but we will not have that many cases.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman just stated it would be only $60,000. I think his arithmetic is wrong.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman knew the number of demands that have been made where the postmasters are paying more now than the office allows them, he would know differently. I stated that I investigated the matter.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is probably correct about that.

Mr. WINGO. I am not talking about the total number of offices in the United States. I am talking about the number of offices where there has been a demand for an increased allowance, where the maximum amount has been allowed.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman know how many of that kind of cases there are?

Mr. WINGO. I think I can give the gentleman the information. I think Mr. Koontz could or anyone connected with the department.

Mr. MOON. I think Mr. Koontz could.

Mr. WINGO. But let us get back to the argument. My amendment simply permits that division to increase the allowance where the showing is made that it should be increased. The gentleman may say that he can furnish plenty of men from Tennessee. I do not know whether he can or not. I think, if the gentleman investigates, he will find that in Tennessee he has at least two offices of this particular class where the allowance is not sufficient to meet the demands. It is true of every congressional district in the United States. This does not call for increased expenditures unless the department, looking into the merits of each case, says there shall be an increase. Can you not trust the department to make the increase? The gentleman says that he is opposed to the increase. His bill carries an increase for the larger offices in the country—an increase of salary in one instance of $600 to one employee—and yet he goes on and in the name of economy cries out against raising the maximum allowance to meet emergencies of the kind cited by me.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman make this proposition clear to the committee, so that it can understand that the gentleman's amendment simply increases the maximum amount and leaves it to the discretion of the department as to whether in each particular case it will grant the increase?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly; and I have repeated that twice. My amendment does not necessarily require it unless the merits of each case, in the opinion of the department, necessitate this increased allowance. I have in mind one place where the postmaster is going to resign because he now has the maximum, and in order to get the proper clerical service, owing to the peculiar conditions which exist in his town, he can not make out of his salary sufficient to maintain himself after paying his clerks; and this man was not a candidate for the position. He was appointed not because he was a candidate but because he is the best qualified man, with a peculiar fitness for the post office, and he took it. Now, will you say, in an instance like that, the department should not be permitted to see that that man has a sufficient allowance to get the necessary clerk hire?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WINGO. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. There are, as I understand, something like 6,000 third-class offices affected or which might be affected by the paragraph and appropriation.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; 6,000.

Mr. MANN. The appropriation is $1,700,000, and the amount of possible maximum allowance runs from $300 to $800. I take it that shows that the maximum amount is not and can not be allowed to all of these offices. If the maximum amount authorized were allowed to the various offices, the total sum would far exceed $1,700,000 of appropriations.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will pardon me, my understanding is there is a maximum allowance that is only allowed in about 10 per cent of the cases that go to these larger offices. There are a lot of third-class offices that are very near offices of the second class, and a greater allowance is needed in about, say, 10 per cent of the cases.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman probably has answered the question, really, which I desired answered, and that was this: Where we make this appropriation of a maximum amount, sometimes that is mere pro forma, and the maximum amount is not allowed unless it is required. In many other cases where they fix the maximum amount it is always allowed and so construed. I take it, of course, in these cases, from the gentleman's statement, that in fixing the maximum amount it does not mean it is to be allowed as a pro forma amount.

Mr. WINGO. No; as a matter of fact, we know the maximum is not allowed in a great many cases of this kind.

Mr. MANN. And could not be allowed under the appropriation.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I would ask that the gentleman have five minutes more; I took up a good deal of his time.

Mr. WINGO. Three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Here is one thing to which I wish to call attention. The very fact that the department has $187,000 unexpended balance shows that the maximum has not been allowed, even to the extent the department might allow it. That is true; but there has been a wonderful growth—and I think the department will tell the gentleman so—there has been a wonderful demand for an increase beyond the maximum in a great many cases, especially a demand in the West along the line of new railroads. In other words, here is a post office that has not quite reached another class. As a matter of practical experience and practical knowledge you recognize it will require about as much clerk hire for an office which is about reaching the third class from the fourth or the second class from the third, and this increase of $100 is something that ought to be made.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the postmasters in my district say the parcel post has increased the general expenses of the office about one-third.

Mr. WINGO. It does not make any difference what causes it; as a matter of fact we know there is an increase. There is a general increase of the number of third-class offices becoming second and fourth-class offices becoming third. There has been a great development in this line in the last 12 months.

Mr. SLOAN. Has there been any increase in the maximum since the parcel post was put into operation?

Mr. WINGO. I can not say, but this is the present law, as I understand it, carried in the bill.

Mr. SLOAN. And that is no greater than it was before the parcel post was put into effect?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know; but I know it is not increased over the present law. My information is that there is no increase over the present maximum allowance.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman is correct; that is the present law. The gentleman says that because there is an unexpended balance of $187,000 that is an evidence of the fact that we ought to increase the amount beyond which they can not go in the payment of salaries of postmasters——

Mr. WINGO. I beg the gentleman's pardon, if he will allow me to correct him. I said this argument was an indication that the estimates had not been correct in reference to the maximum, because they had estimated they would need more, and yet the maximum was so low they could not use it to meet the necessities of individual cases.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, that is not correct. If that is an evidence of anything at all, it is evidence of the fact that there is left in the department down here $187,000 that has not been called for, or if called for could not be obtained under existing law. I suppose the gentleman will not take issue on that proposition.

Mr. WINGO. I agree with the gentleman on the last proposition.

Mr. MOON. We have no evidence before the committee of any calls that have been made that have not been responded to, but the evidence inferentially is exactly the other way. The Post Office Department recommends a reenactment of this very section word for word in the report that is made and in the estimates. Now, if they have been embarrassed in any way, they would not have made that recommendation. Now, there may be some two or three little post offices about in the country where gentlemen think they are not being sufficiently paid, but we have got to take this country as a whole, and I reassert that they can get a dozen men at these places——

A MEMBER. Or women.

Mr. MOON. Or ladies for these places. Now, this thing of openly and flagrantly increasing the appropriations, when there is no fact to justify it and when the department did not want or ask for it, I think ought not to be undertaken in this House.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I think it can safely be said that the amount paid postmasters is not excessive; that it is reasonable compensation. If that is true, then the allowance made for clerical help in the post office, which in a third-class office means an assistant postmaster, in effect, is shamefully too low. The language of this bill, in my opinion, would be better if the amendments offered by the gentleman from Arkansas were adopted, and then the bill should be still further amended so as to read that no sum of less than $400 shall be paid. What does it mean? It means that in a third-class office, where the $300 proposition applies, the postmaster is expected to find somebody to serve for $25 a month. The gentleman from Tennessee says he can find plenty of men in his State who will work for that sum——

Mr. MOON. And plenty of women, too.

Mr. RUCKER. And I say the United States Government ought not to ask any man or any woman qualified to perform this service to work for $25 a month.

Mr. MOON. I will suggest to the gentleman that we are on the other section now—of $400.

Mr. RUCKER. It requires ability, it requires integrity, it requires efficiency; and I say that when the Government demands those qualifications of its citizens we ought to pay an adequate and reasonable salary. If the salary of the postmaster is too high, cut it down; but as it stands to-day the United States Government invites every man named for third-class postmaster by the Post Office Department to go into his community and coerce, as it were, by taking advantage of the necessities of some poor man or poor woman and command their services for the public for 12 whole months for $300. I say it is wrong. These amounts ought to be increased, and I hope this committee will increase them.

I am not particularly concerned about these items. I am not in favor of raiding the Treasury. I am in favor of economy—not theoretical, but actual, practical economy. But my notion is, expressed candidly, that we ought to commence economizing with those who draw large salaries and not eternally plead poverty or inability of the Government to pay and detract and deduct from the meager pittance paid to those who draw low salaries and who actually perform services——

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman was discussing this matter as though we were paying the postmaster $300; but that is not the proposition.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. MOON. The postmaster here gets $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500 a year, and he is allowed this additional help at $400. Suppose he is getting $1,500 and he is getting help at $400; that makes a salary of $1,900. Do you not suppose that most of the men in this country at these little offices would accept that salary of $1,900 and pay it all for one man, without any allowance at all, much less than $400 for help?

Mr. RUCKER. My dear sir, I am one of those Democrats who believe that the man who performs more work in the little towns to which the gentleman refers than some gentlemen do in big towns ought to be paid a reasonable compensation for his work, although performed in a little town. And I say if the salary of $1,100 paid to the postmaster is not too much, he ought not to be required to share it with his clerk. The gentleman concedes that to be the right amount to pay in some offices and that $1,500 is the right amount to pay in other offices. For what? For the service rendered by the postmaster himself. Now, when it comes to authorizing him to provide clerical help we ought to pay him an adequate sum and enable him to pay a person a reasonable sum for the service rendered.

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think that conditions justify the increase in the pay of these clerks in the smaller offices. I represent a suburban district in northern New Jersey, a district of the character to which my friend from Georgia referred. The post offices in that district are both small and large, and their receipts are greatly reduced by reason of our close proximity to New York. I do not think, however, that there is any reason to believe our postmasters in the third-class offices are underpaid or that their allowance for clerk hire is insufficient. On the contrary, my experience and my observation are that they are overpaid if anything, that the compensation which they are receiving as postmasters exceeds that which they would receive in private business, and is more than industrial concerns pay for the same class of service.

Mr. RUCKER. Then, do you not think you ought to reduce the salary of the postmasters?

Mr. TUTTLE. I certainly do. It is my opinion that the salaries of many of these postmasters should be reduced.

Mr. RUCKER. Do you believe in these offices where the salary is $1,000 or $1,100 or $1,200 and the allowance for clerk hire is $300 that the $300 is excessive?

Mr. TUTTLE. It goes to the postmaster and is evidently sufficient, because there is a great rivalry for these offices.

Mr. RUCKER. It goes to the postmaster, as I understand it, with the recommendation that he may employ assistants at $300, and he uses that argument.

Mr. TUTTLE. The postmasters are glad to have the offices under those terms, and they feel that they are well paid, and I believe they are. They employ members of their family—women and young men—and they have no difficulty in running the offices efficiently.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not know how it may be in New Jersey, but I will say it is not true in the State in which I live.

Mr. TUTTLE. Of course the cost of living is high in New Jersey, and they would suffer there if they would suffer anywhere, because we are on the edge of New York City, where expenses are said to be higher than elsewhere.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUTTLE. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. This $300 is not paid direct to the postmaster, is it?

Mr. TUTTLE. It is an allowance for clerk hire.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose he does not have any clerk hire, but does the work himself, does he get the $300?

Mr. TUTTLE. I do not think so. I think he has to account for the clerk.

Mr. BARKLEY. He has, of course, to advise the department of the fact that he has employed this assistant at the $400 rate or the $300 rate, and it is allowed to him?

Mr. TUTTLE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Now, in cases where the office pays $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500, frequently it happens that one clerk is not enough. I know that there are offices in my district that pay no more than $1,500 where it is necessary to have two clerks besides the postmaster. In that sort of a case he is expected to give up part of his own salary to get the additional clerk or get the additional clerk in the $500?

Mr. RUCKER. Four hundred dollars.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; $400 instead of $500.

Mr. TUTTLE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman's position, then, is that the compensation of the postmaster is above what it ought to be to justify him in giving up part of it to pay this expense?

Mr. TUTTLE. That is my position exactly. That is the opinion I have arrived at from a study of these post offices in New Jersey. The postmasters are very well paid for the work that is done.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Government pay the rent for all presidential post offices?

Mr. TUTTLE. Yes; it makes an allowance also for light and heat.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE] says that, representing a district that is suburban to New York, the salaries of postmasters there are thereby decreased. That is a novel idea to me. Having some observation of suburban districts around Chicago, a portion of which at one time were within my district, I learned that the salaries of the postmasters at all of these suburban towns were very largely increased, because the suburbanites would buy their postage stamps at the suburban office more conveniently than they would buy them in the city and carry them into the city, where the mail was canceled; and in all these suburban towns near the large centers the postmaster's salary is not decreased, but considerably increased because of these receipts from the sale of stamps.

In the course of my life I was at one time in charge of a fourth-class and a third-class post office. It was not under civil service, and it is a tribute to human nature to say that, notwithstanding all the assertions about people not resigning, I voluntarily quit the office to study law. I am not sure that it was wise.

In many of these offices there is a considerable amount of additional work required beyond that of merely taking care of the patrons of the office. There are lots of third-class offices which in a way are terminal offices which have an extra amount of work to do, and these allowances that are made under the existing law are usually made because of extra work to be performed at the particular office over that which is ordinarily required at the average third-class office.

Now, we make an arbitrary limitation of the amount. I think possibly that may have been wise in the first place. It may be wise to keep an arbitrary limitation in the bill. And yet it is impossible to classify all of the third-class offices and say which one may need more money for actual service rendered and hit it right in every case. It must depend upon the particular facts of the case, and it seems to me that it would be wise and businesslike to leave it to the Post Office Department to determine what should be the allowance on account of special work at a particular post office.

The facts in the past have shown that the department does not allow these maximum amounts simply because we permit it. The department in acting upon a case acts upon the merits of the case. It must have done so in the past. It is not a pro forma allowance. I can not see any objection to permitting the department in some case where it is now only authorized to allow $300 for extra service to allow $400 if, in the opinion of the department, the extra work required at that office justifies the allowance.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that it is proper to leave the whole matter in the discretion of the department, and the department, in the exercise of its discretion, has especially recommended that no higher figure be given than that named in the bill now. It is known to all of us that when we use the language "fixed at a maximum figure," the persons who are proposing to get the advantage of it always press to the limit. If the amount beyond which you can not go is $400, they will press for the $400, all of them, until they get it, or as nearly so as possible. If you had made that limit $500 at that particular office, they would have pressed for $500.

It is wise for us here to make that reasonable limit which the department proposes to us to make and which has seemed to it best as an administrative proposition, and I hope that the House will vote against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 16, line 17, I move to strike out "$500" and insert "$600."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 16, line 17, by striking out "$500" and inserting "$600."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE] indicate that it is very wise that we have an arbitrary maximum. It also is a good argument to support the proposition of not undertaking to classify arbitrarily all these offices, but to have some discretion left in the department. I am sure my friend from New Jersey, simply because he can get men cheaply in his district, would not want to limit the department in paying what men are worth in other parts of the country.

Now, he may be able to get a young man in his district, a competent young man, for deputy postmaster in one of these towns for $400, as he says. I do not know about his district; I will not speak for his district. He knows about it. But you can not do it in mine. It may be that because my country is a newer country wages and everything else are naturally higher there.

But take the arbitrary maximum in this class. There is not a deputy postmaster in any third-class office in my district that can afford to take the position for that amount, so the postmaster is compelled to take part of his own salary to make up the difference. I do not know how it is in other districts. If you are satisfied in your own district, is there any reason why you should object to leaving it to the department to meet the necessities and demands of some other place? The gentleman says he thinks the salaries for these small post offices are too high, and he is against increasing salaries. Yet in this same bill which you bring in here you increase the salary of one man in the neighboring city of New York $600 a year, or from $3,200 to $3,800. Yet you object to the small salaries in the small towns.

Mr. TUTTLE. Does the gentleman think that $3,800 is too much for a man who has charge of 3,000 men?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know, because I do not know what work he does. Neither does the gentleman know the work that is done in these smaller places, where they can not get men for $400 or $500.

Mr. TUTTLE. I have lived all my life in small towns, having second and third class post offices.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not know anything about the West.

Mr. TUTTLE. I believe that in my district the demands upon all persons because of the high cost of living are as great as in any part of the country.

Mr. WINGO. Has the gentleman investigated the demands in Oklahoma?

Mr. TUTTLE. I have not.

Mr. WINGO. Or in Arkansas, or Missouri, or Texas, or Tennessee? The gentleman does not know anything about the demands out there. Now, I have investigated them. Of course you are going to vote this down. You are perfectly willing to increase the salaries in New York City and the other large cities. You are perfectly willing, you who cry economy, to increase the salaries of men in the larger cities, but you refuse to do justice to the postmasters and clerks in the smaller country towns. You not only deny them justice, but in some instances the same men who vote for the increased salaries in the larger towns say that the men in the smaller towns are getting too much. To be frank with the gentleman, I have no patience with any such philosophy of economy as that. I believe that the man in a town of 3,500 is worth just as much as the man in a town of 35,000 or 3,500,000. It may be true that living expenses are higher in the larger city, and that ought to be taken into consideration in fixing the salaries for such a city; but when it comes down to a question of the worth of the man, there can not be such a great difference between those in the cities and those in the country towns, and no man can make me believe it.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think the gentleman wishes to be fair.

Mr. WINGO. I want to be fair.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is the gentleman's reputation, and that is my observation of him. Now, when the gentleman says there is an increase of $600 in the large city offices he overlooks the fact that there is the absolute wiping out of a $4,000 position; that of the assistant postmaster.

Mr. WINGO. That is true.

Mr. GOULDEN. And the same man who occupies that place, according to the universal views expressed here, is expected to occupy this new position, and in most cases I am sure he deserves it in every respect, but he will take the new position at a salary $200 less than he has been receiving.

Mr. WINGO. Now, that involves the merits of a particular case. What I say is, if there is a particular case in Oklahoma, or Arkansas, or Tennessee, where it will require that a man be paid $600, do you not think you should allow the department to have some discretion in the matter, and not limit his pay to $300?

Mr. GOULDEN. I surely do, as I believe in a square deal all around, no matter what section is affected.

Mr. WINGO. That is all I am trying to get.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman from Arkansas should try to array the country against the city. That is an old political dodge. Inasmuch as I represent a country district, I think I have a right to express my opinion on this subject. This supervisor in New York, whose salary of $3,800 the gentleman speaks of, has control of as many men as would be employed in a thousand post offices like the one the gentleman talks about. Proportionately, therefore, the salaries and allowances to the man in the country are very much greater everywhere than they are to the man in the city, and necessarily so. Now, some gentleman says he can not get men to take the positions. Why, take your clerks in the dry-goods stores in your town at home, or the accountants. I venture to say that there is not one in 50 among them who is getting $75 a month, and here this man gets $75 a month.

Mr. RUCKER. How do you make $75 a month out of a salary of $300 a year?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 19, strike out "800" and insert "900."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] says I am trying to array the city against the town. I am not trying to do that, but I want to tell you that such unjust discriminations as you seek to make by this bill will justly make the country feel that it is not getting a square deal. The gentleman says that not one clerk or accountant in fifty in these towns is getting $75 a month. That statement shows that the gentleman knows absolutely nothing about my district.

Mr. MOON. I did not say "no man," I said "a majority of them."

Mr. WINGO. Well, I will still let the statement stand.

Mr. MOON. Then the gentleman has got a better district than I have.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly; I moved from Tennessee to Arkansas because Arkansas was the better State.

Mr. MOON. Tennessee is sorry to lose the gentleman, but sorry that he turns up, as he does, in Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. I had energy enough to get out of Tennessee and the gentleman had not.

Mr. MOON. May I suggest to the gentleman that he ought not to go back on his old State.

Mr. WINGO. I am not going back on it.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman knows what is said about the birds.

Mr. WINGO. Yes, I know what is said about the birds; and I know what is said about a certain animal, too. [Laughter.] But, seriously, gentlemen, here is a proposition; and I say there is not such a distinction between the salaries in the small towns as in the cities. I know there is a distinction to be made by reason of the increased cost of living, but there is not such a distinction as you make in this bill. Now, I am not speaking from guesswork. I know what I am talking about. I know one office where a postmaster gets up at 5 o'clock in the morning and stays in his office at work until 9 o'clock at night. He has two clerks in the office—one woman and one man—to help him. He is not given a sufficient allowance to pay for the man that is there. Now, this man can not afford to keep that post office. He can draw a bigger salary than he is now getting as mail clerk. He was appointed to that particular office because he is a competent man. I do not pick up any curbstone politician. You can do that; there are plenty of them in Tennessee and Arkansas and elsewhere, but when you put in a post office a competent man I say it is a false economy not to pay him sufficient to get competent clerk hire and keep that clerk's services up to the standard of efficiency. I for one do not believe it is democratic economy to practice economy at the expense of efficiency.

I am willing to increase the salaries of New York, if it is necessary, to get efficient, competent men, but I think the Government ought to meet the emergency in the smaller offices. I do not believe that you ought to pay a Government employee less than he can get in a private employment, but you ought to pay him the same amount that he would receive in a private employment if his services are worth that much. I know of an office in my own district where the allowance will not pay the man what he can get in private employment in the same class of work and for really shorter hours of service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were 12 ayes and 21 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 22, strike out the figures "600" and insert "900."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, if any Member here believes that $50 a month is the maximum amount that should be paid deputy postmasters of the third-class offices, that that is the most they can honestly earn, why, you can vote down my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were 9 ayes and 24 noes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were refused.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post offices, $5,400,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General may, in the disbursement of the appropriation for such purposes, apply a part thereof to the purpose of leasing premises for the use of post offices of the first, second, and third classes at a reasonable annual rental, to be paid quarterly for a term not exceeding 10 years; and that there shall not be allowed for the use of any third-class post office for rent a sum in excess of $500, nor more than $100 for fuel and light, in any one year.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 7, strike out "500" and insert "600."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the object of offering that amendment is that I know of cases where rents are legitimately higher than this maximum allowance. I have in mind one town where the rent of a 25 by 70 foot building is $50 a month, and that is what the merchants are paying. They are making an effort now, because of the burning of the old post-office, to get a new site. It is a town of about 15 years of age, and the wooden part has been burned away, and there is nothing but brick buildings left, and has not been for a few years. The maximum allowance is $600 for rent, fuel, and light. He can rent a building now for $50 a month. I do not believe the Government ought to pay any less than what the rents of the building will bring in town. I know some instances where the Government pays more, but in many instances the Government can not get rents of a suitable character. In that town you have to go on a side street, in an out-of-the-way place, in order to get a rent at that price.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think the fact that the law authorizes the Postmaster General to make a lease for 10 years is of some importance in connection with the ownership of buildings? Is it not better for him to make a lease for $500 a year for 10 years than to make shorter leases at a higher rate?

Mr. WINGO. That is true in the old settled community, but in towns which are just developed no man will bid for a 10-year contract. Five years is as long as you can get a bid on a contract. I have in mind a man who says that he will not bid for a longer contract than five years, because he knows the town is going to grow up, that another railroad is sure to come through there, and it will be the junction of several roads. Of course he would be foolish to tie himself up for 10 years. I think he would be foolish to tie himself up for five years. But you ought to have some latitude so that the department can meet just such a situation.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, this is not a new item. This is exactly the amount that has been carried for years, and the amount the department finds sufficient to meet the demands along this line. On account of the growth of this service there have been some $200,000 added to this appropriation. Unless the department—and it does it as often as we ought to want it to do it—demands more money for the service down there, it seems to me this House ought not to insist upon first endowing the department with appropriations it does not want and does not ask for and does not need. I am surprised at my friend from Arkansas. He makes his district out to be in worse condition, so far as these matters are concerned, than any other district in the country. It must be an isolated case. The demand is not made anywhere else. The department is not asking for any more money, it is not needing any more money, and it is not wanting any more money, and why should we give it any more money? To do so would be only upon one theory, and that is that we know more about the administrative work down there than those people do themselves, that we know they ought to have more money and ought to spend more money than they do expend. I am not willing to take that position. I am always glad to know when they have a decrease, and I am well enough pleased to know that they are not asking for any more than in previous years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 8, strike out "$100" and insert "$150."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] does me an injustice in his inference that if we support the amendment it will be upon the ground that we know more about it than the department. That is not true; but I think I know more about towns in my district than the gentleman does or that the department does. I think I know more about my district than he does. Of course it is an isolated instance. My whole plea is to allow the department sufficient latitude to meet these emergencies. Here is a proposition for fuel and light. I will tell you how they have to do. The merchants in the towns have to go down in their pockets and pay the man who furnishes these buildings with heat and light. The department will have to admit that. You can not get light and fuel in a good many towns for $100 a year.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Is the fuel question an especially pressing one in this town of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. WINGO. I am not speaking about that, but you can find plenty of cases in your own district where light and fuel can not be had for $100.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. He will find hereafter that it can easily be had in sufficient quantities for that sum. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. I did not intend to stir up any unpleasant forebodings, but it is a fact that in most towns the merchants chip in and help pay the owner of the building, so that they will be able to get the post office on their streets. In other words, you take up a collection to support the Federal Government's business in a town.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has several times referred to what the department has asked for and what they have not, and I sometimes wonder whether it is possible to tell what the department asks for and what it does not. While this may not be strictly in order, it will have to come in at some time during the debate. In the recent report of the Postmaster General, on page 1, he says that the audited expenditures for the year amounted to two hundred and eighty-three million dollars and odd and that the adjusted losses due to fire, burglary, and so forth, amounted to $14,333.46. I call attention especially to the adjusted losses due to fire, burglary, and so forth. That is on the first page of the Postmaster General's report, page 3 in the pamphlet. On page 4 of the pamphlet we find again, reported revenues, two hundred and eighty-seven million and odd dollars and charges against revenues for losses due to fire, burglary, and so forth, $14,333.46. That is the same amount, the same item, on pages 3 and 4 of the report. On page 54 of the report we find the same thing repeated. Excess of revenue over expenditures, 1914, four million and odd dollars, and amount of losses due to fire, burglary, bad debts, and so forth, $14,333.46. When I read this same item in three different places in the Postmaster General's report I assumed—temporarily, at least—that it was correct, that they had given the figures correctly three times. It is very unusual to set down any set of figures three times in the report of the Postmaster General. He gave the same figures three times for the amount of loss by fire, burglary, and so forth, as $14,333.46. I then recalled that I had read on page 49 of this report the following statement:

The Postmaster General is authorized by law to reimburse postmasters for losses of Government funds and stamp supplies resulting from "fire, burglary, or other unavoidable casualty," and for losses of such funds in transit to their designated depositories. The total number of claims received during the year was 1,467, an increase of 66 over the previous year and the largest number ever received in any one year. Claims to the number of 959 were settled, of which 722 claims, aggregating $112,999.54, were allowed.

Then I picked up the report of claims of postmasters for losses on money by fires, and so forth, in the letter of transmittal from the Postmaster General, which gives the total of all of these, and it concludes by giving the total of $112,999.54. Three times the Postmaster General reported the amount as $14,333.46, and twice he has reported it at $112,999.54. I do not criticize the Postmaster General. Undoubtedly he obtained the information from his subordinate officers; but does he get one set of figures from one set of officers and another set of figures from another set of officers? I question whether the Post Office Department always knows what it is asking for, or whether we can tell what it is asking for, when on a small item like that three times the Postmaster General reports $14,333.46, and twice he reports $112,999.54 in the same report.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 17.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers. It might serve the useful purpose of getting more Members in here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas demands tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For horse-hire allowance, the hiring of driving and the rental of vehicles, $2,600,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. Strike out the word "driving" and insert the word "drivers."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows.

Page 17, line 24, strike out the word "driving" and insert the word "drivers."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For car fare and bicycle allowance, $565,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 1, page 18, after the word "fare," the words "and bicycles."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 1, strike out the words "and bicycles."

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman the reason for this?

Mr. MOON. Yes; the reason for this is, the bicycle allowance is covered in another item.

Mr. MANN. Does the amount remain the same?

Mr. MOON. The amount is reduced.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For per diem allowance of 2 assistant superintendents, while actually traveling on official business away from their home, their official domicile, and their headquarters, at a rate to be fixed by the Postmaster General, not to exceed $3 per day, and for their necessary official expenses not covered by their per diem allowance, not exceeding $500; in all, $2,660.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "$2,660" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,120."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 22, in line 7, by striking out "$2,660" and inserting "$2,120."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, $851,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move at this point to strike out "$851,000" and insert "$845,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman withhold his amendment until after the Clerk finishes the reading of the paragraph?

Mr. MOON. I thought on yesterday a ruling was made that we should stop before the proviso, although at that time I thought the better practice was to conclude the reading of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. This appears to be a little different case, if the gentleman will pardon the Chair, the Clerk will finish the reading of the paragraph, and then the gentleman can offer his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, $851,000: Provided, That the rate of compensation to be paid per mile shall not exceed the rate now paid to companies performing such service, except that the Postmaster General, in cases where the quantity of mail is large and the number of exchange points numerous, may, in his discretion, authorize payment for closed-pouch service at a rate per mile not to exceed one-third above the rate per mile now paid for closed-pouch service; and for mail cars and apartments carrying the mails, not to exceed the rate of 1 cent per linear foot per car-mile of travel: Provided further, That the rates for electric car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rates paid for service on steam railroads: Provided, however, That not to exceed $15,000 of the sum hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise, and not to exceed $100,000 of this appropriation may be expended for regulation screen or motor screen wagon service which may be authorized in lieu of electric or cable car service.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, line 9, page 22, by striking out the figures "$851,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$845,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, amend, in line 9, by striking out "$851,000" and inserting "$845,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation for two delegates to the International Postal Union at Madrid to be appointed by the Postmaster General from the Post Office Department, made by the act of August 24, 1912, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, is hereby continued and shall be available for such convention when it shall be held.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What does this International Postal Union propose to do?

Mr. MOON. It proposes to make agreements and conventions in reference to transportation of mails, postage, and interchange of mails between the respective countries participants in such conventions, and many other things that pertain to the foreign postal service.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, how much appropriation was made in 1912?

Mr. MOON. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. FOSTER. How much has been used?

Mr. MOON. Why, there has not been any convention held, and there may not be any the next time.

Mr. FOSTER. And this is to make arrangement between this country and foreign countries——

Mr. MOON. Yes; in the event the war ends.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Illinois will recall that two years ago there was a contest over this, and we reduced the amount of appropriation proposed from $10,000 to $5,000.

Mr. FOSTER. That is my recollection.

Mr. MANN. And $5,000 is all right for the convention if held.

Mr. FOSTER. So we have not spent any of the money?

Mr. MOON. None; we have not had a convention.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say further, in reply to my colleague's question, that these conventions have fixed the postal rate between all the members of the union, and unless we are in the union we can not get advantage of the rates that are fixed by the Postal Union.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel and miscellaneous expenses in the Postal Service, office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, $1,000.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question for information. Is there any provision in here regarding terminals for circularized matter? I have had a good deal of complaint about the sending of circulars through the mail on account of the delay in getting them to their destinations.

Mr. MOON. I do not know of any provision of that sort.

Mr. CULLOP. As I understand it, there has been some new regulation made by which circulars sent out either pass directly through the town or city for which they are intended and to which they are addressed to a terminal, and there a redistribution takes place, and in that way the distribution of these through the mails is very much delayed, to the great inconvenience and sometimes injury to the patrons of the service.

Mr. MOON. That would be purely an administrative proposition, of which this committee would not take cognizance unless it was brought expressly before it. I know of no complaint of that kind before the committee.

Mr. CULLOP. Well, I did not know whether there was any provision in this bill for the regulation of that matter or not.

Mr. MOON. No.

Mr. CULLOP. From the complaints I have received from the patrons of the department, it seems to me that there ought to be some change made in the regulations regarding this service. As I understand it now, terminals are established over the country for the purpose of handling the circularized matter that is sent out from the wholesale houses and other businesses which circularize the country, which very much delays the distribution.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman may be speaking of the general terminal service that is supplied in a great many cities, and not merely to circulars, but to all classes of mail.

Mr. CULLOP. This seems to have applied largely to the mail for circulars. For instance, I had a letter the other day in which it was stated that the circulars sent out for a certain meeting of importance passed through the town on to the terminal, were stored away there some time for redistribution and for retransportation, an additional cost, and they arrived at their destination three days after the convention was over and too late for use.

Mr. MOON. That is a matter for the department.

Mr. CULLOP. Is that kind of practice going on in the service? It seems to me it ought to be regulated in some way, or at least stopped, so that the people would have prompt service for which they pay. I have been looking through this bill to see if there is anything on that subject and have failed to find anything, and consequently I ask the chairman of the committee for information on the subject.

Mr. MOON. I would say to the gentleman there is nothing in the bill on that subject of which I am aware. I never heard the question presented before.

Mr. CULLOP. I could show the gentleman, I think, some pretty strong letters condemning the matter very thoroughly and, further, showing an improvement should be made in this branch of the service, in order that it fulfill the requirements of the public and serve the convenience of the people who pay for the service. The efficiency of this department should be zealously guarded, and wherever improvement can be made it should be done and opportunity for criticism removed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In reference to the matter spoken of by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] I have, contrary to the experience of the chairman of the committee, received many complaints concerning the matter of delayed distribution of mail.

Mr. MOON. I have no doubt of that. However, I have not had them.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have heard of complaints that the distribution of mail has been delayed in the different terminal offices. Now, the cause for that, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, so far as I can learn, arises from the efforts of the Post Office Department to save space in the railway post-office cars. It is a fact that since the addition of parcel post to the mails a great deal of space is required, and if all the space that they could conveniently use were allowed for distributing mail en route, then the railway post-office car service would be greatly augumented. This would add expense. But in order to overcome that tendency which has developed by reason of the parcel post the department has made an effort to do the distributing in place of having it done on the moving cars, in the terminals. It has been a subject of complaint in the large cities, like St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Chicago. In one instance, in Chicago, circulars which, for instance, announced an event for the 10th of the month, had been mailed on the 5th and not distributed until after the event.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. In inaugurating that system the department, I should think, would economize very much, because they are hauling, in many instances, this matter addressed to some town and through it to some terminal. It is there stowed away and in the course of business redistributed, hauled back part of the way over the same road, for which the Government has to pay, to the town to which it was addressed, and has been delayed, in many instances, several days, and both the work and the expenses multiplied for handling it; whereas if they had the distribution of it in the car and would drop the matter at the destination to which it was addressed they would save that expense of duplicating the hauling and the handling.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is a matter of administration. There is no doubt but there is a great deal of delay since the addition of the parcel post, because of the distribution in the terminals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is nothing in the paragraph under consideration relating to this matter, because that relates entirely to a different subject.

Mr. CULLOP. I did not contend there was anything in this paragraph, but I asked for information on the subject, and desired to call the attention of the committee to the service, about which there is a great deal of complaint.

Now, while we are on that subject, I want to call the gentleman's attention to another matter. A great many complaints have been made lately about losing parcel-post packages in transportation. I have had a number of those recently, in which they seem to have been lost—at least they did not reach their destination. They were either lost or stolen. Has the gentleman any complaints of that kind?

Mr. STEENERSON. Well, I want to finish what I have to say on the other matter first. There is nothing in this paragraph, but it is important that we should consider this feature of administration. The committee did not deem it necessary to provide any new legislation to remedy the defect, because it can be remedied by administrative action. If they will authorize or order sufficient distributing space in railway post-office cars, the distribution need not be delayed. But it is a fact, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana, that there is considerable complaint on this score.

As to the loss of packages, of course that is an incident to the business, and the parties have the right to insure them. It does not require any legislation. That is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For pay of letter carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of substations, and tolls and ferriage, Rural Delivery Service, $54,700,000: Provided, That not to exceed $20,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations: Provided further, That for experimental purposes, under such regulations as he may prescribe, the Postmaster General is authorized to advertise for proposals and to enter into contracts with the lowest responsible bidders for a period of not exceeding four years, for performing service on rural routes in one county in each State, and to pay for the same out of the amount hereby appropriated.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. MOON. I am making the point of order. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] need not bother himself about that. I have the floor.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not the floor on the point of order. I make the point of order.

Mr. MOON. I make the point of order. That is what I rose for, exactly. I make the point of order on that part of the section commencing on line 13 with "Provided further," and the balance of the paragraph. That is subject to a point of order. The rule does not cover it, and I do not care to discuss the question, but ask that it be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] makes the point of order on the language pending in the bill, on page 25, line 13, commencing with the words "Provided further," to the end of the paragraph. The Chair thinks the language is subject to a point of order. It is new legislation.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word just simply to remark that I rose for the purpose of making that point of order, and the gentleman from Tennessee was recognized and started to make some remarks. I did not know whether he was going to make a point of order or not, and therefore I insisted on the point of order, and he said I need not trouble about it, that he was going to make it, and, of course, that was satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by star routes (excepting service in Alaska), including temporary service to newly established offices, $9,000,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for continuance of any star-route service the patronage of which shall be served entirely by the extension of Rural Delivery Service, nor shall any of said sum be expended for the establishment of new star-route service for a patronage which is already entirely served by Rural Delivery Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 25, line 22, after the word "offices," by striking out "$9,000,000" and inserting "$9,100,000," with the proviso: "Provided, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to provide difficult experimental or emergency mail service in mountainous States in such manner as he may deem advisable without advertising therefor."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this amendment adds $100,000 to the general appropriation to provide for certain emergencies for star routes, and in doing so it follows the language in this bill by which some freedom is allowed in arranging for a mail service in Alaska.

During the general debate I told of several routes which had collapsed on account of the weight of parcel-post matter sent in from the outside. Various offers have been made to the Post Office Department to revive, maintain, and serve these routes in the mountainous country. In one case I understand the Forest Service maintains, over the very road where the post-office people can not maintain a route, a pack-horse train at regular intervals, paying for the use of horses $1 each and feed, and to the owner of the horses $75 a month, and to the driver or leader of the pack train $60 a month. Now, here comes a man with an offer to revive the mail service along that very route for less than the rates paid by the Forest Service. He offers to convey the mail for $60 a month and 50 cents a day and feed per horse required. That is $15 less than is paid for the man owning the horse, and 50 cents a day less for each horse, and he agrees to use only as many horses as the parcel-post business which has to be done may require. That must not be done by experimental arrangement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is this parcel post carried at a profit or at a loss to the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is carried almost invariably at a loss.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it necessary for the Government to provide sufficient means to carry into a mountainous country like that all of the supplies that are carried under the guise of parcel post where it will cost probably twenty times as much to carry as the Government receives from it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I certainly do. If the parcel post is established on a 50-pound basis, and the bulk of it originates in a city, and the people in nonsparsely settled districts have the benefit of that service, certainly the people in the sparsely settled districts should also have the benefit of the same service.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, the people in the nonsparsely settled districts or in the thickly settled districts are not asking for an exception to be made to the general rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No.

Mr. MANN. Now, if the Government is carrying these parcels out there—which means practically all the supplies they get there—a man who lives upon the top of a mountain would be foolish if he were to refuse to let the Government carry his supplies up to him for one twenty-fifth of what it costs him to do it. Should he furnish the rule by which he should secure both mail service and supplies? Should he not be compelled to choose between the two?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He gets no mail service of any other kind.

Mr. MANN. It is because of his attitude on the parcel post, because he wants his supplies taken up.

If you were to let this work out by contract under such circumstances, the Government will carry all supplies to all portions of the country where it is very expensive to take them. Perhaps that is what the Government will be brought to eventually, but I doubt whether you will ever get the chance to do it without letting a contract.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, will the gentleman allow me in turn to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How does the Post Office Department now go about it in arranging for carrying parcel post at 2 cents a pound in addition to paying on a bid contract for carrying the rest of the mail?

Mr. MANN. I do not know that there is anything in the law that forbids it. If there is, I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire two minutes more. I want to call the attention of gentlemen who come from some of the larger cities to the fact that one of the things that breaks down the parcel post in these outlying districts is the sending out of mail-order catalogues, each one of which weighs as much as a brick, thereby inducing these people in the far-off districts to send off their money in payment for more mail packages which come back and further break down the service.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is not proceeding in order. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed in order for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have presented the amendment to this paragraph in good faith. It carries the same verbiage as the bill carries for the benefit of Alaska, and it has reference to a district that is 20,000 square miles in extent, the remote portions of which are entitled to the maintenance of their star routes so they may receive letters and papers. The residence there did not invent the parcel post and they are not responsible for the collapse of several routes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Is the business that goes into that section drummed up by the mail-order houses or does it originate there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is drummed up by the mail-order houses, of course.

Mr. MOORE. If the mail-carrying business is conducted at a loss, as the gentleman indicates, two parties are getting the benefit of it—the mail-order house and the persons to whom the packages are delivered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and on top of that the Government owns half of the property and resources out there, which further deprives these people of a chance to develop their localities.

Mr. MOORE. Is there no other way by which the people can get their supplies? Are there no local stores or agencies, or do they require these mail-order supplies in order to exist?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There are small but good stores away out, we will say, 30 miles from the railroad, originally doing a fair sort of business and carrying a fair stock. The parcel post has in many cases greatly reduced their business, so that a storekeeper who was doing a business of $50,000 a year has had his business reduced to $20,000 or even $15,000 a year.

Mr. MOORE. Ought we not to have some consideration for that local storekeeper?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think so; and I think the United States is big enough so that its mail service ought not to be carried with the intention of endeavoring to show a profit. I believe that the far-off man on a rural route is entitled to his parcel-post service the same as he was entitled to his letters before the parcel post broke down the whole mail service on certain of these routes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to the carrying of mail-order catalogues, and I think it is worth while to make an observation on the subject.

Mail-order catalogues are third-class matter. They are very large and very heavy. The gentleman from Washington said that one would weigh as much as a brick. Well, I am inclined to think it would be a lightweight brick that would compare with a mail-order catalogue. These catalogues were not included in the parcel-post law. I was one of those who insisted in private that the parcel-post law should not be so drawn as to include the mail-order house catalogues. I thought the mail-order houses were getting enough benefit out of the parcel-post law without reducing the cost to them of carrying their catalogues over the country at the expense of the Post Office Department. I think it used to cost almost 40 cents in postage to carry one of these heavy catalogues of a big mail-order house as third-class matter.

Under the construction which Postmaster General Burleson made of the parcel-post law he issued an order covering third-class matter into the parcel post. What is now being done is that the mail-order houses, instead of sending their catalogues from their home city and paying even parcel-post rates on them, which would be considerably less than the third-class rate, are sending them by freight to different parts of the country, so that they get the local parcel-post rate; and where the Government used to get in the neighborhood of 40 cents for carrying a catalogue it now carries it for, I think, 2 or 3 cents.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not a fact that the great mail-order houses do the same thing in the distribution of merchandise by mail—shipping it in carload lots by freight to distributing points, like Seattle, for instance?

Mr. MANN. They did not ship it otherwise before the parcel-post law was passed. Here is a plain discrimination in the interest of the mail-order houses. Though I do not think that was the intention of the Post Office Department, that is the result, because now they send their catalogues at a cost very much below what it was before and the Government practically loses all the money which it formerly received, which was a very large amount.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Can the gentleman give us any idea how much the Government has lost?

Mr. MANN. I have not computed it. I do not know. Of course the mail-order houses are in my town. I am not attacking them.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I did not know but the gentleman had an idea how much the Government was losing by this.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois I wish to say that the Assistant Postmaster General in charge of this matter stated at the hearing that instead of it costing the Government more by reason of the catalogues being withdrawn from the mail and shipped by freight it was gaining by it. It was a saving to the Government, because it reduces the railway mail pay very largely, and he said the saving in that way was more than enough to make up for the loss of postage on the catalogues.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. How much did he say they were making on it?

Mr. STEENERSON. He did not go into details, but he stated that the saving in railway mail pay would more than make up for the lost postage.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. That statement is not correct as compared with the mail-order catalogues treated as third-class matter. Everyone familiar with the Post Office Department knows that the third-class matter has always more than paid its way. Taking mail-order catalogues out of third-class matter and authorizing them to be sent at parcel-post rates and sent as they are now sent very greatly reduces the income of the Government without any corresponding reduction of the expenses of the Government, and if the First Assistant Postmaster General or any other Assistant Postmaster General states to the contrary he does not know anything about it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tenenssee makes the point of order against the amendment. The Chair thinks that it provides for a service not provided for by law, and therefore the point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For experimental village delivery service in towns and villages having post offices of the second or third class, $200,000.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee concerning the paragraph just read. Under this bill, as I understand it, because of the provision on page 16, the proviso that in the disbursement of this appropriation no employee shall be paid at a rate higher than $600 per annum, then the man who delivers the mail in the experimental delivery service of towns and villages can not receive a compensation of more than $600 per year, or $50 a month.

Mr. MOON. I do not think that has any relation to the subject at all.

Mr. CULLOP. I understand that is the highest compensation that can be paid for such service.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman is speaking of the proviso with relation to compensation of clerical service in third-class offices. This is an entirely new proposition.

Mr. CULLOP. Some time ago I had established in a town in my district a village delivery system. When it came to getting some one to perform the duties of carrier to distribute the mail the department said that under the provision of the Post Office bill the man could not receive a compensation of more than $50 a month. Certainly no one will contend that a man who can perform that service is not worth more than $50 a month, and a compensation of that kind is wholly inadequate.

In this case I have in mind they were unable to get a man to perform the duties at that compensation. I know of no other provision controlling it than the one I have just read, because he is an employee in that office, is under the jurisdiction of that office for which he makes the delivery, and the proviso in this section applies to the third-class offices, and simply makes it impossible for him to be paid more than $50 a month for that service. The carriers are employees of the offices in a sense, as I understand, by construction of law with reference to that matter; and if that be true that he can not receive more than $50 a month, this provision for trial delivery in post offices of the second and third class is a failure. It could not be made workable, for the reason that the compensation is such that no man able to perform the duties will accept the position. I would like to know if there is any other provision that regulates the pay of these men engaged in delivery work.

Mr. MOON. I do not think the matter has any relation one to the other at all. This is an experimental fund, separate and distinct from all others, to provide for a service in the towns and villages for post offices of the second and third class, and $200,000 is appropriated for that purpose. The Postmaster General can use the fund at any place he sees fit, and I think he could make compensation regardless of the section to which the gentleman refers. Whether the Postmaster General does or not, I can not inform the gentleman from Indiana, but I do know that under this provision it is the purpose of the department, as I am advised, to use the rural letter carrier for the performance of this duty—to throw these villages into the position of a rural route, and the routes will be changed in length in accordance with the services performed, so as to get a proper length of route and get the pay allowed under the statute.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to state to the gentleman from Tennessee that if that is the proposed plan you might as well abolish the attempt to have a village delivery, for the reason that in these villages they ought to have two or three deliveries a day. Mails coming to business men require prompt delivery, and they either ought to have a reasonable number of deliveries, or they ought to have none, so that they can go to the office and get their own mail. If we were to have only one delivery by a rural carrier who makes his trip out in the morning and back in the afternoon, the people will get no benefit from it.

Mr. MOON. You can have two deliveries a day, which is sufficient in any town or village.

Mr. CULLOP. It may be and it may not be. Mails coming to and going out of town must determine the necessity of the number of deliveries as well as the times of arrival and departure of the mails.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. I want to state to the gentleman from Indiana that this is purely an experimental proposition. It is not sufficiently developed to determine whether the service will be justified or not. It may be and it may not. The sum of money is to be used the best way that the department can determine and get the most feasible means of carrying on this work for that class of people who do not now have the benefit of a city delivery or rural delivery. It is under the experimental proposition and definite plans can not well be established.

Mr. CULLOP. Well, certainly the gentleman from Tennessee will agree that if the pay of these men is limited to $50 a month, or $600 a year, you will not have any experimental service. You will not get the opportunity to try it out as is desired, for the reason that you can not get competent men to do the work for that sum of money. No one can afford to accept the position on any such meager compensation as that.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Where does the gentleman get the information that they are limited to $600?

Mr. CULLOP. Well, from the one established in my district, where the postmaster was instructed to select a man for carrying the mail or making the delivery, and he was instructed that the department would only pay $50 a month. The postmaster could not find a man competent for the place who would accept it for that compensation.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Was that experimental?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; that was to establish a village delivery system. It is perfectly needless to talk about getting men to perform such a service for $50 a month. The laborer ought to be worthy of his hire, and he ought to have a reasonable compensation for the service that he renders.

Mr. RUBEY. If the gentleman from Indiana will pardon me, I want to say that we have an experimental service in my own town, where the carrier receives more than $50 a month; I think he receives $60 or $70 a month.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, in the instance I speak of, one that has come under my own observation, the postmaster was instructed that he could not pay more than $50 a month. He promptly wrote to me that he could not get a man to perform the service for that price. It was in a mining territory. There are large coal interests there. The mails are heavy and wages are high. The men employed in the mines get large pay, and consequently he could find no man suitable for this position at $50 a month. That is not sufficient pay for this work. It ought to be a larger compensation.

Mr. GOULDEN. What is the population in this town?

Mr. CULLOP. Thirty-five hundred.

Mr. GOULDEN. And that in the town of the gentleman from Missouri is twenty-five hundred.

Mr. CULLOP. The population of the place I refer to is thirty-five hundred. It is a rapidly growing town, where there are large mining interests and great mercantile business.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there is no limitation fixed by law for compensation for services under this experimental proposition. The trouble with the gentleman is not with the law, but he would better wrestle with the Postmaster General and get a little more money for his man.

Mr. CULLOP. I undertake to say that under the construction of this proviso on page 15 of this bill a basis can be found to construe it to apply to this very matter. While it says that in the disbursement of this appropriation no employee shall be paid at a rate higher than $600 per annum, that will or may be construed to apply to this very kind of service, and if it is so construed, then this man can not get a larger salary than $50 a month for this work, which is wholly inadequate. I do not know whether the construction would actually hold good, if tested; but as long as the Post Office Department exercises its right to so construe it the other party is helpless to get away from that construction. I insist that it is wrong. If it is to be held to apply, then all can see it is an instrument of harm rather than benefit.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to see my friend put himself in a bad attitude here. I have insisted from the beginning, as a matter of legal construction, that his proposition is different from the proposition that is before us. Here is the report of the department for village-delivery service in operation December 1, 1914. The gentleman has a town called Garrett in Indiana, has he not?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but it is not in my district.

Mr. MOON. They pay that carrier $700 a year.

Mr. CULLOP. Look at the town of Jasonville, which is in my district, and see what they pay him there.

Mr. MOON. Jasonville has probably less population than the other.

Mr. CULLOP. No; Jasonville is a town of 3,500 population.

Mr. MOON. Jasonville, $600. There is another place in Indiana where they have two carriers, $1,200.

Mr. CULLOP. The Jasonville carrier is paid at the rate of $600, which is wholly inadequate.

Mr. MOON. But that is a matter of complaint with the department. If the gentleman wants more money, he should go down and get it. It is there.

Mr. CULLOP. But suppose they do not give it to me? The result is the public suffers. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOON. Then the gentleman is in bad luck. In every State in the Union where this service is in force there are places where the compensation is more than $600.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Would the gentleman oppose an amendment increasing the appropriation beyond $200,000. as provided for in the bill?

Mr. MOON. Yes. I can not agree to any increase. This is purely experimental, and I think we ought to have the final report on the experimental service and determine whether it is effectual or abandon the experimental proposition.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Can the gentleman state when that report is expected?

Mr. MOON. I can not say; but I should say that we ought to have it before a great while.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 26, line 5, by striking out all of lines 5, 6, and 7.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the argument that we have just heard shows that this experimental rural service in villages is largely unnecessary. We decide we can not have routes in mountainous countries, so why go on with an experiment in villages at a cost of $200,000, when there is a general demand that the United States save every penny of its income? Here is a chance to save $200,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rental and purchase of canceling machines and baling presses, including cost of power in rented buildings, motors, repairs to motors, and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation, $300,000.

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 29, line 6, after the word "operation," by striking out "$300,000" and inserting "$325,000."

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Chairman, this is in the interest of economy, because this additional $25,000 is required for the purchase of baling presses to supply first and second class post offices in the country. The committee favor this addition, and undoubtedly a great saving will result.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUTTLE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice the item for baling presses. I really do not know what a baling press is in a post office. Will the gentleman explain it?

Mr. TUTTLE. It appears that the waste paper which accumulates in the post offices at the present time is either given away, burned, or otherwise not accounted for. It will bring about 12 cents a hundred pounds not baled, but if baled the price will be from 24 to 35 cents a hundred pounds. In Chicago it is as high as 45 cents a hundred. These baling presses are in use commercially by most of the large stores and industrial concerns. They may be operated by the laborers, and cost from $15 up. Those now installed in the post offices, I think, average about $22 apiece, but there are only 146 of them in the service.

The Fourth Assistant Postmaster General estimates that $25,000 will equip the first and second class post offices of the country and will undoubtedly result in a saving of from $100,000 to $200,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question. I see this item contains a provision for buying of canceling machines. Can the gentleman inform us what the department is doing in reference to buying canceling machines or whether they are going ahead and renting machines at the present time?

Mr. TUTTLE. I regret I can not inform the gentleman. Maybe the chairman can do so.

Mr. MOON. They are buying most of them.

Mr. FOSTER. I mean the little hand machines which the Government rents for, I think, something like $90 apiece per annum. As I understand, Congress has fixed the maximum price that can be paid for canceling machines at $270?

Mr. MOON. That is the gentleman's own amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the reason I am asking how they are getting along.

Mr. MOON. They are getting along very well. They have been renting them, but now they have reached the point where they think it is better for them to buy them.

Mr. FOSTER. So I now understand they are buying these machines instead of renting them.

Mr. MOON. Yes; they are buying them.

Mr. MADDEN. They are running them themselves, and they are getting along much better.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That if the revenues of the Post Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenue of said department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply said deficiencies in the revenues for the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1915, and the sum needed may be advanced to the Post Office Department upon requisition of the Postmaster General.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he has the wrong fiscal year named in this paragraph, which provides for paying out of the revenues a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915. It should be 1916.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to the gentleman. That is a mistake in printing. I move to amend by inserting "16" instead of "15."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 30, line 18, strike out "15" and insert "16."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the meaning of this section, may I ask, in reference to the establishment of branch offices, nonaccounting offices, and so forth? Also, what is the meaning in connection with the next section? Some one stated on the floor here the other day that under this section 3 it would be possible for the Postmaster General to abolish all offices in a county except one post office, and have the others as branch offices, which might be quite an economy.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I can state to my colleague in answer to the question that from the reply of the Assistant Postmaster General these nonaccounting branch offices were just contract stations.

Mr. MANN. But contract stations are already authorized and appropriated for, and this can not apply to contract stations, because they are authorized under existing law, and this bill carries an appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what he said these were.

Mr. MANN. Then this has no place. I suppose the intention originally of this was to authorize in a city, say, Chicago, Boston, New York, or St. Louis, the abolishment of a post office that lies right adjacent to the city in order to establish a branch office there, as I think we did specifically at St. Louis and at Boston.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what the Postmaster General stated.

Mr. MANN. My colleague does not mean to say that there is not law now authorizing branch offices?

Mr. MADDEN. There is a law.

Mr. MANN. I mean the contract stations which we have had for many years and for which we carry an appropriation of $1,200,000 in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I think that there is a law which authorizes that, but that was the statement made by the Postmaster General, with the request that he be permitted to enter into a contract for four years instead of one year. The committee provided for two years, and I think it is provided for in a place earlier in the bill, where not only appropriation is made, but a provision is made that the Postmaster General may be authorized to contract for two years, and this provision of the bill is a duplication of the other.

Mr. MANN. Of course there is no objection to the provision whatever, although I would not want to see incorporated in a post-office bill a provision which authorizes the abolishment of all the post offices in a county except one without our knowing what was being done.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question with reference to his construction of it. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he construed this provision to mean that the post office of a county seat might be a central office for a number of offices radiating around it, and then such offices could be abolished and made substations to it.

Mr. MANN. I did not construe the section at all. I was trying to get a construction of the section. I said some one said on the floor the other day that this provision would authorize that. I was trying to ascertain if that was the purpose.

Mr. CULLOP. And then centralize the operation more than it is now if such could be the construction of this provision. Does anybody know just exactly what this provision is intended to do and the purpose of it?

Mr. MANN. I plead not guilty myself.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to find out from some one, if possible, its real purpose.

Mr. MOON. There are certain legal restrictions imposed on the establishment of stations and branch offices and nonaccounting offices, if there is any authority now expressly for nonaccounting offices, and these restrictions the Post Office Department would like to remove as far as possible and give more latitude to the Postmaster General in the establishment of branch offices and nonaccounting offices and stations. In other words, to be clear about the matter, it is to give a freer hand to the Postmaster General in connection with all of this work.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the chairman a question if he will permit me. Is it intended that this shall be construed so as to do away with independent offices and make them substations to some central office in a given territory or locality?

Mr. MOON. That power exists now. It is done every day or two.

Mr. CULLOP. That is done as to very small offices.

Mr. MOON. It is done in big ones, too.

Mr. CULLOP. Is that the purpose of this provision?

Mr. MOON. No; that is not the purpose of that particularly, because that power exists now, but there are restrictions which they insist are placed, that I do not now recall, upon the exercise of this power in the establishment and maintenance of a substation or a station, and I believe there is no authority now for the nonaccounting station, and it is this power that the administration asks for.

Mr. CULLOP. What do you mean by nonaccounting offices?

Mr. MOON. That word is subject to one or more constructions, perhaps. Generally what I understand by a nonaccounting office is where a fourth-class office buys all of its supplies, pays for them, or gives bond for them, and they take the receipts of the office, and they do not send in its monthly accounts or its quarterly accounts or annual accounts.

Mr. MANN. Are not now the nonaccounting offices those that do not account directly to the Post Office Department, but only to the postmaster of the town in which they are located?

Mr. MOON. They do account and they must account for the supplies they get.

Mr. MANN. They account to the postmaster. He makes the account to the Post Office Department. They do not account directly to the Post Office Department.

Mr. MOON. They do not account to the Postmaster General, you mean? That is true.

Mr. MANN. I think that is the distinction.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That hereafter the Postmaster General may enter into contracts for the conduct of such stations for a term not exceeding four years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Section 4 reads:

That hereafter the Postmaster General may enter into contracts for the conduct of such stations for a term not exceeding four years.

I assume the words "such stations" were intended to apply to the preceding section; but if so, is not there a conflict, and is there not a conflict, anyhow? On the bottom of page 15 you provide that the postmaster may enter into a contract for a term of two years for a contract station. Now, you provide that he may enter into a contract for four years for these stations. And I think the stations are the same stations.

Mr. MOON. I will say to the gentleman that I have a memorandum on my desk here, which I made, to the effect that if this section was passed, which is on page 15, section 4 would be unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. I think it is unnecessary.

Mr. MOON. I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, strike out all of section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That on and after July 1, 1915, when the total compensation of any postmaster at a post office of the fourth class for four consecutive quarters shall amount to $1,000, exclusive of commissions on money orders issued, and the receipts of such post office for the same period shall aggregate as much as $1,900, the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall so report to the Postmaster General, who shall, in pursuance of such report, assign such post office to its proper class, to become effective at the beginning of the next succeeding quarterly period, and fix the salary of the poatmaster accordingly.

Mr. MANN. The word "poatmaster," in line 23, page 31, should be changed to "postmaster." It is a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That hereafter the Postmaster General may transfer, under such regulations as he may prescribe, clerks from post offices of the first and second classes to the Railway Mail Service at salaries not exceeding the salary which the clerks are receiving in the post offices at the time of such transfer, with the consent of the clerk.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I beg leave to offer an amendment, with the consent of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 34, after the word "clerks," in line 5, insert the words "or carriers"; on the same page, in line 8, after the word "clerks," insert the words "or carriers"; and on the same page, in line 9, after the word "clerk," insert the words "or carrier."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid to railroad companies from the 30th day of June, 1915, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, for the transportation and handling of the mails and furnishing facilities and services in connection therewith upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter provided.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, page 34, line 12, I move to strike out the words "30th day of June" and insert in lieu thereof "1st day of July."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 12, strike out the words "30th day of June" and insert in lieu thereof "1st day of July."

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman sure about that amendment?

Mr. MOON. That amendment is recommended by the department, because the fiscal year begins then.

Mr. MANN. I know. This would be "from." "From" would not include the first day. You had better say "from and after the 30th day of June."

Mr. MOON. That is all right. I do not object to that amendment, inserting "from and after the 30th day of June." I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 12, after the word "from," insert the words "and after."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $1 as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car and 50 cents as an initial rate and the same as a terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 16, after the word "car," insert the following:

"Provided, That the compensation now paid the railway companies operating lines with a total mileage of less than 90 miles for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car shall not be less than they are now receiving."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. MOON] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN] is not on the floor at this moment. If here, I think he would like to present some such amendment as this. I have a letter here from the president of the Farmer's Grain & Shipping Co., which is a road owned by farmers in our State, and something like 80 miles long. He calls attention to the fact that if this bill is passed in the form in which it is now the compensation which they will receive will be only $7.76 for each trip.

I would like to have this letter read. It is written by a man by the name of James M. Kelly, who is, as I say, the president of this farmer's company.

Mr. TUTTLE. Does that show the amount which they are receiving under the present act?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; it does. It perhaps explains the situation better than I can, as I had not expected to present this matter. I regret that I have not had the opportunity to collect any information to speak of upon this subject. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the letter be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEVILS LAKE, N. DAK., December 26, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE M. YOUNG,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to H. R. 19906, by MOON, of Tennessee, I understand this bill has been added as a rider to the Post Office appropriation bill and has a good chance of passing the House, and I would like to call your attention to its effect on the revenues of a small road such as ours.

Since July 1, 1914, when our compensation for carrying the mails was increased on account of the increased weight of the mails which it was found we had been carrying, we have been receiving $13.46 per day for carrying and delivering the mails along our line, furnishing a 15-foot apartment in a car for that purpose, which you will acknowledge is little enough compensation for hauling, heating, lighting, and the upkeep of a car, aside from the expense of delivering the mails at each of the post offices from the train. I don't think it would be possible for the Government to get this service performed by team for less than 25 cents per mile, which, in the case of our line, would amount to $33 per day as against the $13.46 we are receiving. And still the Moon bill proposes to pay us at the rate of 5½ cents per mile, which, with the additional weight compensation, would reduce our pay to $7.76 per day. And in addition it proposes to penalize us at the rate of $5,000 per day if we refuse to perform the service.

Up till now we could refuse to perform the service if the pay did not suit us, but on account of the great convenience it has been to our patrons to have the mail delivered promptly we have continued to give the service at considerable loss. But now to have our compensation, small as it was, cut almost in two, and on top of that to force us to do it whether we like it or not, is certainly reverting to the methods in vogue in the Dark Ages, and I hope that you will oppose this bill with your vote and influence. It is to be regretted that the Postmaster General seems inclined to follow the lead of his predecessor in trying to make a showing for his department and at the expense of railroads, and I believe that such a policy in connection with the past attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission toward the railroads has more to do with the present depression in business than the change in our tariff laws.

I am, yours, sincerely, JOS. M. KELLY.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the chairman of the committee will not oppose this amendment. It may require to be changed somewhat in form. So far as I am personally concerned, I would be satisfied to have this matter left in the discretion of the Postmaster General.

It seems as though small roads of this kind, owned by farmers and others of limited means, where it was difficult for them to finance the company in the first instance and rather difficult to manage it with a minimum of expense, there should be some provision which would at least permit the Postmaster General to pay such roads at least the amounts that are now being paid to them under existing law.

Mr. TUTTLE. Mr. Chairman, I hope that no further amendments will be made to this particular section of the bill.

This section, as the House knows, constitutes the bill that was reported by the joint commission on compensation to the railroads for the transportation of mail. It has been amended by the House committee by giving additional discretion to the Postmaster General and in reducing the rates favored by the joint commission.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUTTLE. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. If the report of that commission has been amended by the committee already in other respects, why not amend it also in this respect, to help out the farmers who own this road?

Mr. TUTTLE. Well, certainly any amendment of that kind should have a great deal of consideration before it is incorporated in this legislation. There will undoubtedly be cases of injustice, as there always have been; but I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee that this plan of paying the railroads is in the interest of the short-line railroads, of which the gentleman speaks. It remedies many kinds of injustice, and the commission, in framing the schedules, had them in mind and provided liberally for them. Undoubtedly there are railroads that have been greatly underpaid. Railroads are built under such varying conditions in different parts of the country, where distances and the character of business are so diverse that it would be impossible to treat each individual line with absolute fairness and justice. But this bill, I think, goes as far as possible at present in the interest of short-line railroads.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. TUTTLE. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. In this particular instance there is no request for an increase; but the idea of these men is that they should be permitted to keep the compensation they are now receiving.

Mr. TUTTLE. Well, under any rearrangement that might be made the pay of some railroads will be reduced, as in the case here, and some of them will receive increased compensation, and, in the main, roads of this class are going to get the benefit of this legislation. The gentleman's amendment might possibly be advisable and justifiable, but it certainly should be carefully considered by the committee and by the House before it is incorporated in this bill.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. One other question. Would not the gentleman be willing to leave this matter of compensation to small roads of that kind in the discretion of the Postmaster General? There can not be very many of them. Limited——

Mr. TUTTLE. The compensation is now in his discretion. Limited, however, by these maximum rates.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Limited to the amount now paid.

Mr. TUTTLE. I would not be willing to accept the amendment. My personal opinion is that Congress ought to fix the rates and not leave them to the discretion of the Postmaster General at all. My colleagues on the committee and my colleagues in this House believed otherwise, and have left it discretionary with the Postmaster General to fix the rates which the railroads should receive for their services, provided they do not exceed those named in this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] make a point of order on the amendment?

Mr. MOON. No; I will withdraw the point of order and let the Members vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the subjects that have received, through the instrumentalities of Congress, a degree of investigation commensurate with its extreme complexity.

It must be manifest to the House that in dealing with 2,000 railroad corporations, each one presenting a species of facts of its own, it would be utterly impracticable to apply a single standard of compensation to each one of those roads that would work out exact justice to each one of them, each railway having a different scale of operating expenses and capital charges. The commission, therefore, which reported on this matter, having tried that view, after a year's study, had to abandon it. The commission abandoned the idea of making compensation to each railway according to its particular circumstances and adopted a uniform standard of compensation for car-mile movement throughout our country.

If an exception is to be introduced, as proposed by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], it would necessitate a prolonged study, to begin with, of the facts appropriate to that exception. It would be utterly beyond the power of even the commission, on the facts presented by this letter of protest, to reach any conclusion as to the righteousness of the claim set up, and of course quite beyond the faculties of the House, sitting here as a general body.

When the president of a road declares that that road is being underpaid for a service, it does not follow by any means that that is a fact. I do not mean by that to suggest that the president of the road is insincere or untrustworthy, but I mean, sir, to suggest a much broader difficulty, which is the absence of any unit by which you can determine whether any particular rate on any railway is just or otherwise, because you can not allocate the costs of any particular service with enough precision to determine whether the rate fixed is too high or too low.

Mr. Chairman, I know the conviction is widespread among railway men that the passenger service—that is, the 25 cents per car mile—does not yield its full share of railway revenue; and I do not question their sincerity. It is unfortunate that railway expenses as between the freight and passenger services do not, as railway men themselves admit, permit of such segregation as to determine whether they are right or wrong. All efforts to so segregate have been abandoned by railway economists. It may be interesting, however, to see how the American case compares with other countries. In the United States the railways secure an average receipt of $1.91 for each ton of freight carried and the average journey of the ton is 257 miles. The average receipt from the passenger is 66 cents and the average distance traveled is 33 miles. Thus the ratio of the ton to the passenger charge is three (2.90) to one. I now insert a table giving the like ratios for other countries:

Receipts from freight and passenger service of several countries compared.

Country	Receipt per ton, freight.	Receipt per passenger.	Ratio, ton to passenger charge.
Argentina	$2.05	$0.467	4.4 to 1
Austria	.83	.182	4.6 to 1
Belgium	.53	.105	5.0 to 1
Denmark	1.03	.24	4.3 to 1
France	1.08	.225	4.8 to 1
Germany	.79	.13	6.0 to 1
Norway	1.00	.225	4.4 to 1
Sweden	.63	.209	3.0 to 1
Switzerland	1.24	.164	7.0 to 1
Average			4.8 to 1
United States	1.91	.66	2.9 to 1

Per capita tonnage and passengers and average distance traveled by railroad in several countries.

Country.	Tons per capita.	Passengers per capita.	Freight journey.	Passenger journey.
			Miles.	Miles.
Argentina	5.3	8.3	101	20
Austria	6.4	9.2	60	25
Belgium	10.4	24	49	1/2
Denmark	2	7.7	53	21
France	3.1	12	81	24
Germany	8.7	20	71	1/5
Norway	2.5	6	35	1/7
Sweden	6.7	9.4	44	1/2
Switzerland	4.7	28	45	1/2
United States	10.8	10.5	257	3/3

Thus in other countries the tendency is to pay about five (4.8) times as much to move a ton of freight as to move a passenger. Here the ton tax is less than three (2.90) times the passenger tax per journey. It appears, too, that while we rank first in the ton traffic per capita, we rank but fifth in the passenger traffic; and this is, I believe, a consequence mainly of the difference in the freight and passenger tariffs, whether this disparity be justified or not. If now the transportation tariffs possess the ethics and the incidence of taxation as practically all railway economists have come to agree, would it not seem that any augmentation of such tariffs should fall on the freight rather than the passenger movement? In other words, does not the contention that the passenger traffic is relatively underpaid fall to the ground?

Now, this commission has approached this subject with the aid of the best talent of the United States in transportation matters, with the aid of railroads, with the aid of the postal authorities who have been studying it for a long time, and with the aid as well of the experts of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Upon what principle have they proceeded? They found, to begin with, that the mails usually move in passenger cars. Very well. What did the railroads get on an average for the movement of a passenger car, assumed to be 60 feet long? They were able to find the average revenue from express, passengers, mail, and all the passenger traffic in terms of 60-foot car miles. It developed that this average revenue was in the neighborhood of 25 cents (24.69) per car-mile. Having reached that conclusion they argued naturally that since 25 cents a car-mile represented the product of rates that had been fixed by the railroads themselves, it was a commercial basis upon which the commission might legitimately proceed to consider what a postal car mile should pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Reserving the right to object, if the purpose of the gentleman is to vote down the amendment I had rather it be done right away than to wait for a long, labored explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Then they said if 25 cents is the average product from all this service upon rates for the most part as determined by the railways themselves, should a postal car pay as much, more, or somewhat less? After an investigation the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads concluded that, for various reasons, the Postal Service should pay something less than this average return, and they fixed upon rules of compensation that mean about 8 per cent less than this average return, or about 23 (22.73) cents per car-mile. It is manifest, of course, to anyone with average railway experience that there are some items of expense which attend the movement of the passenger that do not attend the movement of the mails. There is an immense body of accounting that the railroads have to undertake with regard to the passengers that has not to be undertaken with regard to the mails. These are not all, but are suggestive reasons why a rate of compensation less than the average for the passenger traffic has been adopted in this bill.

Mr. TUTTLE. May I interrupt right there?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. TUTTLE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Maryland if at this point he will include those items which would make that 8 per cent difference in favor of the mail car?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I shall try to do so. There are the following items to be considered, namely:

First. Passenger-travel accounting.

Second. Passenger advertising, stationery, printing, and so forth.

Third. Maintenance of passenger ticket offices down town, and so forth.

Fourth. Expensive passenger terminals and maintenance.

Now, no one can say that these equal 8 per cent difference in cost of service. But let us see just how matters stand in regard to the rates proposed. The following table gives average rates for a 60-foot passenger car per mile of travel:

	Cents.
(1) Average railway revenue per passenger, mail, and express car	24–69
(2) Average revenue for express car (1910)	22–80
(3) Average rate for mail car under Moon bill	22–73
(4) Average rate recommended by joint commission	24–69

It should be noted that the average for the express car is based on the experience of 1910. Since then these rates have been reduced 15 per cent, and the small parcels, yielding the highest revenue to the railways according to weight, have gone to the parcel post. Both circumstances probably mean an average reduction in express-car revenue to the railways of at least 20 per cent, and this would mean that the present express car is yielding only 18.24 cents per car-mile to the railways, or but 80 per cent of the mail rate proposed in this bill.

Now we come to the case of the shorter roads and the rates accorded them by this bill. They have found, for example, that terminal expense means more to a railway on a 40-mile haul than it means on a 400-mile haul, because the terminal expense will remain substantially the same whether the haul be short or long. Compensations to cover that expense are provided in this bill, because standard compensations for terminal service, independent of the distance traveled, are given by the bill.

This will be made clear from the following table of rates carried in the Moon bill:

Round trip.	Terminal rate, round trip.	Mile rate.
		Cents.
60-foot car	$8	21
60-foot car storage	8	20
30-foot car	4	10.5
15-foot car	2	5.5

TOTAL RATE PER MILE.

	For 40-mile haul.	100-mile haul.	400-mile haul.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
60-foot car	31	25	22
30-foot car	15.5	12.5	11
15-foot car	8	6.5	5.75

Thus the small roads get much the larger rate. But a substantial discrimination is made in favor of the smaller roads in another way. In the many cases where a 15-foot apartment car is unjustified by the traffic, and where railway post-office car service is not maintained, the mails are to be shipped in what are called "closed pouches," and for this service the compensation is to be based on the weight of the pouches and the space standard is set aside.

The rates for such service are to be as follows:

	Rate.	Per ton-mile.
Up to 200 pounds	$42.75	$1.17
500 pounds	64.12	.70
1,000 pounds	85.50	.47
Railway rate for excess baggage		.10

These rates can be said to be the highest—many times the highest—paid for any species of rail transportation anywhere in the world, and their payment represents a distinct purpose to be helpful to the small roads. If the Government were to apply commercial standards to this "closed-pouch" traffic, the rates would be much lower. For comparison, let us take a 50-mile railway as representing the small road. What rates does it ask of its patrons for carrying baggage? Well, when it carries baggage beyond the limit allowed with the ticket, its rate is one-sixth the first-class fare per 100 pounds. At 3 cents a mile for the ticket, one-sixth amounts to just 10 cents per ton-mile, and the services performed for the closed pouch and the baggage are practically identical. Yet this bill, in its purpose to be generous to the small roads—and most of them are owned by the big roads—provides a compensation from 5 to 12 times as great as such railways are demanding from their commercial shippers. If the Post Office Department should ship this "closed-pouch" matter by express on the same car, it would save probably 75 per cent or more, and yet the railway would receive but half the express rate from the express company.

In my judgment, the commission has reached a sane and just conclusion with regard to this subject. A conclusion that will satisfy and please all the parties? No; certainly not. The railway managers of this country will, of course, remain loyal to their functions, and loyalty to their functions at this time represents a demand for more revenue. It is their business to get more revenue in whatever direction they can. Meanwhile public servants must be loyal to their function as well, and one of the considerations in that connection is this: Where we are fully paying the railroads to-day for carrying parcel-post matter—that is, where the weighings have taken place since the parcel post began to move—we are paying them about twice what the express companies pay for moving the same quantities the same distance. Now, justice is not only an absolute but it is a relative matter as well in transportation matters. I am sure no man would argue, whatever the intrinsic merit of the rate itself, that the Post Office should pay more to the railways for carrying its packages than the express company, its competitor. And yet, under the existing law, the Postmaster General is said to be paying an average of 10 cents a ton-mile to the railways, the old mail rates, while the express companies are paying but 5 cents a ton-mile or less. On 20-pound parcels moving from New York to the following points the Post Office has to pay more than twice what the express companies pay:

Railway pay on 20-pound parcel.

New York to—	Distance.	Express company pays to railway.	Post office pays (average) to railway.
	Miles.
Pittsburgh, Pa.	444	$0.23	$0.44
Chicago, Ill.	912	.32	.90
Lincoln, Nebr.	1,447	.47	1.44
Pueblo, Colo.	2,005	.66	2.00
Stockton, Utah	2,483	.88	2.40
Reno, Nev.	2,947	1.03	2.90
San Francisco, Cal.	3,191	1.12	3.15

Of course this means that the Post Office Department can not do business at all on these distances, and yet it has to take the unprofitable business—the rural routes, for example. It is true that no one is to blame for this manifest incongruity in express and parcel post railway pay. It represents simply the accidents of express company and postal evolution or history. This bill corrects all that and puts the postal establishment where it surely has a right to be—on terms of substantial equality with the express companies of the country upon the rail lines of the United States.

I apologize for having entered upon this subject at all. It is so long and complex that it would take hours to cover even the characterizing conditions it presents, but I think at least this much ought to be said.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota), there were—ayes 12, noes 29.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purpose of ascertaining the average weight of closed-pouch mails per day upon which to adjust compensation, the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to have such mails carried on the several routes weighed by the employees of the Post Office Department for such a number of successive days, not less than 35, at such times after July 1, 1915, as he may direct, and not less frequently than once in every year thereafter, the result to be stated and certified in such form and manner as he may direct. In computing the average weight of mails per day carried on a railroad route, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor. The expense of taking the weights of mails and the compensation to tabulators and clerks employed in connection with the weighings, for assistance in completing computations, and of rentals, if necessary, in Washington, D. C., shall be paid out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, in line 7, on page 39, I move to strike out the word "July" and insert the word "January."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 7, strike out the word "July" and insert in lieu thereof the word "January."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not want that to read January 1, 1915, does he?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This bill will not be passed until long after that.

Mr. MOON. I know; but it will commence when it does pass. Here is the suggestion of the department:

Referring to the paragraph of section 11 found at the top of page 39 of the bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department, etc., I have to suggest the advisability of changing the date named in line 7—July 1—to January 1. This will permit the weighing of closed pouch mails before July 1, 1915, and the fixing of the pay for such mails to begin on that date. Otherwise, if the plan becomes effective July 1 and the department has no authority to weigh the mails prior to that date, such adjustments will be greatly delayed after the service becomes effective. This was explained by the Second Assistant Postmaster General at the hearings.

Mr. MANN. I see the point; but why not say "after the passage of this act," instead of saying that they can do certain things after a certain date?

Mr. MOON. I am always willing, if I can get what I want, to get it in any way necessary. I have no objection to the amendment in that shape.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out, in line 7, the words "July 1, 1915," and insert "the passage of this act."

Mr. MOON. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 7, strike out the words "July 1, 1915," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to agree to that amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General is authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and to rent quarters in Washington, D. C., if necessary, for the clerical force engaged thereon, and to pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether he desires to give the Postmaster General the authority that is given him in this paragraph. This permits the Postmaster General to employ at Washington in the departmental service employees who will be paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mail.

Mr. MOON. What is the objection to that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We keep the departmental service separate from the general Postal Service. I did not know whether it was the intention of the gentleman, or the wish of the gentleman, to have that paid all the time out of that appropriation, or whether it was to take care of the immediate situation. I wish to suggest, whatever else be done, that the word "act" in line 1, as well as lines 4 and 16, shall be changed to "section."

Mr. MOON. I think the language had better remain as it is, but I think the word "act" should be stricken out wherever it occurs and the word "section" inserted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the word "act" in line 1, line 4, and line 16 be changed to the word "section."

Mr. MOON. That is satisfactory to me, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, lines 1, 4, and 16, strike out the word "act" and insert the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the amendment be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice on page 42, at the bottom of the page, a provision that—

If any railroad company carrying the mails shall fail or refuse to provide cars or apartments in cars for distribution purposes when required by the Postmaster General, or shall fail or refuse to construct, fit up, maintain, heat, light, and clean such cars and provide such appliances for use in case of accident as may be required by the Postmaster General, it shall be fined such reasonable sum as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

I do not understand under what authority of the Constitution or otherwise we can fine a railroad such sum as the Postmaster General may deem proper. Of course, if we have a contract with the railroad we can provide a penalty to be taken out of the money due the railroad company, but when you undertake to say that we can take away the power of the courts and let the Postmaster General determine how much a railroad company shall be fined, it seems to be going beyond the constitutional power.

Mr. MOON. Technically the gentleman from Illinois is correct, we have no power to do anything of that sort. But the word "fine" has a fixed meaning in postal parlance; it means a reduction from the compensation due the company.

Mr. MANN. That is what I supposed was intended.

Mr. MOON. And the word is used in that sense.

Mr. MANN. I wondered whether it was not practicable for gentlemen to think it over and change the language for the better.

Mr. MOON. It might be well, but that is the intention and the meaning of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 19, after the word "routes," insert the following: "And hereafter detailed estimates shall be submitted for such service in the annual Book of Estimates."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that the gentleman provides that this legislation shall go into effect on the passage of this act, making provision for railroad transportation, so that there shall be no embarrassment to the Post Office Department. It seems to me that we should keep separate the departmental and the postal expenditures.

Mr. MOON. I think that is very wise.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This merely requires them, instead of having a lump-sum appropriation, to submit detailed estimates.

Mr. MOON. That is very proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General shall, from time to time, request information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter, and may, in his discretion, arrange for the transportation of mail matter other than of the first class at rates not exceeding those so ascertained and reported to him, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates fixed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is it the object of that section to permit the Postmaster General to provide for the carrying of magazines and all other mail matter except letters, by express at express rates?

Mr. MOON. To which line does the gentleman refer?

Mr. COOPER. Beginning on line 20 on page 44.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if I may volunteer to answer the gentleman's question, I have definite views as to what is intended, though I do not know that they accord with those of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. Then I will ask the gentleman from Maryland to answer the question.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The circumstances to which I referred a moment ago, namely, that the express companies are paying a very much lower rate to the railroads than we are paying for the carriage of parcels. The Postmaster General, under this clause, would have the right to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and get what would be necessary to him as a shipper, namely, an equal rate.

Mr. COOPER. Is this an attempt to change in this way the postage rates on magazines and newspapers?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. No; not at all.

Mr. COOPER. Will it result in that?

Mr. MOON. No; it can not possibly.

Mr. COOPER. What other mail will be carried at express rates?

Mr. MOON. That does not change the postage. It is the contract price for carrying.

Mr. COOPER. I understand, but what I am getting at is this: Is this an attempt to have the magazines carried by express rather than go as they now go, by the pound rate?

Mr. MOON. No; I do not think so.

Mr. COOPER. What mail matter except first class, letters, and so forth, will be carried by express?

Mr. MOON. It does not say by express. It provides that the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, arrange for the transportation of mail matter other than of the first class at rates not exceeding those ascertained and reported to him, and that it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates as are fixed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. COOPER. Exactly. For a number of years there have been efforts made to have the postage on magazines and newspapers increased. All sorts of representations have been made, some of them grossly exaggerated and some of them, in my judgment, deliberately false, as to what it costs to carry this under the present system, as if it were the prime object of the Postal Service to make money.

Mr. MOON. I think the gentleman's suggestion would more properly apply to the language on page 45.

Mr. COOPER. I mean all of the language. This authorizes the Postmaster General to contract with the railroads for the carrying of newspapers and magazines, and so forth, by express.

Mr. MOON. I see what the gentleman is getting at now. The Government is now engaged in the carrying of magazines, which is second-class matter, by fast freight rather than by express or by fast mail. In two divisions of the country this is done. Those magazines, as the gentleman knows, are printed some two weeks before the date of delivery, bearing a date two weeks ahead. The Government performs its contract by delivering the magazines at the time it agrees to deliver them, but instead of carrying them by express it carries them by fast freight.

Mr. COOPER. How do those rates compare with express rates?

Mr. MOON. In two sections, I believe the second and third—the country being divided into four sections—my recollection is, offhand, that the Government has saved in one section $1,280,000, and in the other one million four hundred thousand and odd dollars by adopting this fast-freight plan rather than carrying the magazines as heretofore by fast mail. It delivers the magazines at the time it contracts to do it, and there is that much saving. The purpose under that section is to put the whole country under that blue-tag proposition. The gentleman will find, if not there, further along in this section, provision for the repeal of the section of the law that prohibited the extension of the blue-tag proposition to the other two sections of the country.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman tell me what is the difference between the average rate by express for carrying this matter and by fast freight?

Mr. MOON. No; I could not, offhand, tell the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Could the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS]?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The only light I can offer upon it is that there is a provision in all express contracts with the railroads that the express rates shall never be less than 150 per cent of the freight rate. It might be approximately correct to assume fast-freight rates were one-half of the express rates.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; but you authorize them to make contracts at the express rate——

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. No.

Mr. COOPER. The bill says "It shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rate fixed by the Postmaster General."

Mr. MADDEN. Here is what it authorizes: It authorizes the Postmaster General to ascertain from the Interstate Commerce Commission what the express companies pay the railroad companies, and if he finds the express companies are paying the railroad companies less than the Government is paying them, then he has the right to demand the same rate that the express companies are paying the railroads.

Mr. COOPER. But my question was this: At present they are carried by fast freight, and if this becomes a law it would authorize the Postmaster General to carry these same articles—magazines, papers, and so forth—by express, and to pay the same rate as the express rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more, just to have these questions answered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Let me explain this. Suppose we are paying at the rate of 23 cents per car mile?

Mr. COOPER. By fast freight?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. No; by mail car. We find the express companies are paying only 18 cents per car mile, and we find that fact by going to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Then we have the right to demand of the railroads that they will carry everything except first class, which is the kind of stuff carried by express companies, at the rate of 18 cents per car mile. The railroad can protect itself by raising its rate to the express companies. If it will not do that, it ought to protect the Government by giving it equal rates as a shipper as anybody else. The Government is entitled to equal rates as a shipper. That means a rate as low as any other kind of shipper of the same matter, and the object of the clause is to secure to the Government as a shipper an equality with every other kind of shipper.

Mr. COOPER. Well, Mr. Chairman, that does not meet my question as I want it met. At present the Government sends magazines by fast freight, and the gentleman says that this rate by fast freight is considerably less than express rates. Does he not?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I assume it will be more than one-half.

Mr. COOPER. More than one-half express rates, but this section authorizes the Postmaster General to inquire of the railroad companies what the express companies receive, and then the last two lines of the section provide that "it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates fixed by the Postmaster General." That will allow the Postmaster General to contract for the carriage of mail that now goes by fast freight at the express rate, which the gentleman himself says is much higher than the fast-freight rate.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Surely.

Mr. COOPER. Why do you do that?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The gentleman makes the error, I believe, if he will pardon me, in thinking the bulk of the traffic consists of magazines, but the bulk of the traffic does not consist of magazines. There is an immense amount of traffic which can not go by fast freight, because that method would not suit, it is too slow, and the stuff has to go by passenger car.

Mr. COOPER. It authorizes the Postmaster General to contract at express rates for carrying magazines——

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. As Judge Moon states, some magazines now go by passenger train, and it leaves the Postmaster General to say whether the fast freight will reach some of these cases.

Mr. COOPER. In other words, it would leave to the discretion of an executive officer the right to contract at double the rates for what he now pays for satisfactory service, and at a less rate.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Let me say to the gentleman that the trouble with the Post Office Department to-day is, if there is any, and for a few years past, that the Postmaster General has been treated as if he were a thief, that he has not been allowed that liberty of action, that power of initiative and direction given every president of every industrial corporation in this country; but 400 of us up here on the hill, with only a momentary idea of what is best, tell him what to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], if he wants to say a word.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this, that it is not fair to assume that the Postmaster General, whoever he may be, would pay double the rate if he could get the product carried for half the rate. And even though you give him the discretion, he is bound by every sense of decency and justice to carry the property that he is charged with having carried at the lowest rate he can get.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, of course there is no one that would impugn the integrity of the Postmaster General or attack any executive officer of the Government. But this is a Government of laws, and not of men, and there should be a limit set upon the discretion to be exercised by executive officers in the expenditure of public money. But here we deliberately say in so many words that the Postmaster General shall contract, at a rate which may be, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] has just said, for the carriage of magazines, twice what we now pay for a satisfactory service. Of course he would not, perhaps, do that, but no opportunity to do it should be given by law to any official. We should not write such a law. We should not deliberately enact a statute that will permit the Postmaster General in his discretion to pay twice as much as we now pay for a service that is entirely satisfactory, though I take the answer of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] to mean that this would be possible.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that if I understand the object of this paragraph it is to provide a method whereby the Postmaster General, after this new space plan of railway mail pay is adopted, can transport this mail, which need not go expeditiously, at a cheaper rate than he would be compelled to pay if he used space.

In order that it may be more clear, I would call the committee's attention to the fact that under existing law, where we pay by the pound per mile, we have authorized the Postmaster General to withdraw from the mails magazines and periodicals that are not frequently published and that need not be transported so expeditiously as first-class mail, before the weighing period takes place, and to keep them out of the mails during the four years between the weighing periods, and during those four years transport them by freight. And it is claimed by the Post Office Department in their reports and in the hearings on this bill that they have saved two or three millions of dollars a year in that way. Although we can do that now, by withdrawing them from the mail before each quadrennial weighing, we could not do so if we adopted a space plan for railway mail pay, which this bill contemplates. Therefore, when we adopt a space plan, we would pay so much directly for the moving of the car. That car might have a load of 5,000 pounds or 20,000 pounds, and in case of a storage car it might have as high as 30,000 pounds to the load. But usually the R. P. O. cars, so called, carry a load of 2 or 2½ tons—probably 5,000 pounds is the highest, though they might average less. And if we pay for them at the rate of 25 or 26 cents a mile, then it would pay to ship the magazines and these other periodicals that need not move so expeditiously by freight, and therefore this paragraph is intended to authorize the department to save railway mail space under the new plan and, instead, pay the freight, and no one would be injured by it.

It will simply authorize the Post Office Department, when the new space plan is perfected and put into operation, to save money by shipping this kind of matter by fast freight, and there is no undue amount of discretion involved in the proposition, as I can see. On the contrary, I think the criticism of the gentleman from Maryland is wide of the mark, and I can see no objection to it at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster General, in cases of emergency between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags and other equipment theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and where such return requires additional authorization of car space under the provisions of this act to pay for the transportation thereof as provided for herein out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee wants to change the word "act," on line 4, to "section."

Mr. MOON. Yes. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to make the change indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 46, line 4, by striking out the word "act" and inserting the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any railroad company to refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do, and for every such offense it shall be fined not exceeding $5,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I do so, Mr. Chairman, to inquire whether there is any doubt about our authority to impose a fine upon a railroad for refusing to permit the Postmaster General to confiscate its property if he should so choose. Is there any doubt about our authority?

Mr. MOON. You can impose a fine in the sense of a punishment provided under the law for the offense, but, of course, the Postmaster General has no authority to confiscate property. He has authority to reduce the compensation.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the provision now that makes it unlawful for a railroad company not to accept a contract tendered by the Postmaster General at the rate fixed by the Postmaster General, and if the railroad company refuses, to fine it not exceeding $5,000. Of course the fine does not amount to very much, if that is all that it is. We have certain powers, of course, in the regulation of the Postal Service under the Constitution; but does it go to the extent of permitting us to say how much we shall pay a railroad company for transporting the mail, or requiring them to transport it free, if we should say so, and then fine them if they refuse to do it?

Mr. MOON. I think we have the power to fix the rate, provided it is a reasonable rate, and to punish the railroad company for not carrying it if it refuses to do it at a reasonable rate. But we have not the power to fix a rate that would be in any sense confiscatory; and if we do that, then the action that we take here is unlawful, and the section could not be enforced. That would be a question of mixed law and fact for the court.

Mr. MANN. Well, practically this gives to the Government officials the power to fix the rate at which mail shall be carried.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And there is nothing in it that says that it shall be a reasonable rate.

Mr. MOON. Yes; but the law of the land says that. The law of the land is a part of every amendment to it.

Mr. MANN. This is not the law of the land.

Mr. MOON. I know; but if it were not reasonable it would not be the law of the land under the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is what I am trying to find out—whether this is constitutional or not.

Mr. MOON. We propose to write the legislative will on that subject in this act. We can do it under the Constitution, provided our act is not confiscatory of the property of the railroad company. If it is, then our act here is invalid, and that will be a question for the court to determine.

Mr. MANN. Ah, that is not a question for the courts under this if the act is valid.

Mr. MOON. The interpretation, I mean. The gentleman from Illinois should understand that the interpretation is a question for the courts. If the railroad companies say that they are not satisfied with this action and that it is violative of their constitutional right and that it takes their property and confiscates it to the public use without fair compensation, then the courts are open to determine that question. There is no doubt about that, in my opinion.

Mr. MANN. I am not at all certain of that. Of course if the Government takes the property of the railroad companies, they have a claim against the Government. But we have taken the property; we frequently take the property of people, although the Constitution says we can not take it without making compensation. But we take it, and then they have a claim against the Government.

Mr. MOON. When we take it we have to provide an indemnity.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman represents the State of Tennessee, where the Union soldiers are said to have taken a great deal of property during the Civil War and made use of it. We have many claims here which have not yet been paid, and which my friend from Tennessee is urgently insisting ought to be paid, because the Government took the property over 50 years ago. They have not got their money yet.

Mr. MOON. That is not a case like this. That is a major force exercised incident to war, and that is not the construction of a civil act.

Mr. MANN. We take the property now. What I want to get at is, where is the authority to say that one party to a contract can lay down the lines of the contract, although that party is the Government, and then fine the other party because it does not accept the contract.

Mr. MOON. It is a governmental power that we have under the Constitution which we have the right to exercise. It is the sovereignty of the people, being exercised upon a corporation which is but the servant of the people, and the courts have always held that we have the right to take the property of the corporation, or to force it to action in behalf of the Government, where we do not confiscate it.

Mr. MANN. The courts will hold that the Government has the right to take property, and then must make compensation for it under a claim against the Government; but if any court has ever held that the Government can go to a man and say, "I want to buy your wagon; I will pay you 10 cents for it; that is all it is worth; and if you will not take it I will fine you $5,000 because you do not sell it to me"—if any court has ever held that, it is news to me.

Mr. MOON. No court ever held that, and no court ever will hold that.

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. MOON. But when the Government says, "Here is your property; I want it; and here is the compensation," if the amount of the compensation is just and reasonable the man has got to take it. If it is not just and reasonable, as in the case of your wagon at 10 cents, all the man who owns the wagon has to do is to say, "I refuse, because the constitutional right I have is superior to the act of Congress, and Congress has no power to confiscate my property." And if the Government then proceeds, it proceeds at the peril of the invasion of the man's constitutional right, and the courts are here for the protection of the citizen under such circumstances.

Mr. MANN. But here is a provision fining the man.

Mr. MOON. Of course, the whole thing is void if it is confiscatory.

Mr. MANN. Here is a provision fining the man because he does not accept a contract which you admit can not be enforced.

Mr. MOON. The provision fining the corporation would be void if its effect was confiscatory, but the man at his peril raises the question against the sovereign Government.

Mr. MANN. If the whole act is void in case there is confiscation, then the whole act is void to begin with.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I want a chance to use a little of my time.

Mr. MOON. Then I will ask that the gentleman have 10 minutes, if necessary. I just want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that when we pass an act of this character, enforcing the sovereignty of the Government in the control and disposition of property, in the action of a corporation, we pass it upon the idea that it is just and right and that we do not confiscate its property. But we may be mistaken about that. It may be that we have gone farther than we had the constitutional right to go. If we have, then our whole act here is void, and the citizen, under the Constitution, can protect himself against such legislative enactment. But if in the consideration of the case it finally turns out that we have justly exercised our sovereignty against the creature of government, the corporation, and that the corporation has attempted wrongly to disobey the legislative mandate, and that, in fact, there has been no confiscation, but that proper action has been taken by the Government, then the railroad company must submit to the inevitable and pay the fine.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, you can not determine the constitutionality of an act by a particular case which may arise, because when the question comes before the courts in one case they determine the constitutionality of the act before some other case has arisen. So that the validity of this act must be determined upon its face, not by the question whether the Government attempts in future in a particular case to confiscate. The Government may attempt in some particular case to confiscate. The gentleman from Tennessee says that renders the act invalid.

Mr. MOON. It is nonenforceable in that particular case, of course.

Mr. MANN. If the act is constitutional and valid, then that is imposing a fine on a railroad company which does not accept the rate offered it in a contract; and there is one place in the bill, the paragraph referred to a moment ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], where the Postmaster General is permitted to fix as low a rate as he pleases, except that he can not fix a higher rate than the rate imposed by express companies; and the railroad company then must carry the mail at the rate so fixed by the Postmaster General, which may be 1 cent a ton. Of course, you could not enforce that; but, then, you apply the criminal procedure, which undertakes to say that if a railroad company does not accept it you will fine them $5,000, and if the act is valid that fine will be imposed.

I think probably the courts will say that the act is not valid, to begin with, and that may destroy your whole act, as far as this matter is concerned. I do not know whether the Government has ever attempted to fine a railroad company for refusing to carry the mails. I doubt whether a railroad will ordinarily refuse to carry the mails, but I question very much the propriety of the Government saying to a man or a corporation, "You must do a certain service for me, or sell me a certain thing at the price which I name, and if you do not I will fine you or send you to jail," because if you have the power to impose a penalty as a fine you have the same power to send the officers of the corporation to jail who do not agree to the contract.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask, as affecting the jurisdiction of this body, if the Southern Railroad Co. should say to-morrow to the Government of the United States "We will not carry the mail from Washington to New York," what power is there in the Government to make them do it? It has the power of a sovereign over a creature of the law. Whenever this body says to that Southern Railway Co. "You shall carry the mail," that mandate has got to be obeyed, provided that in saying it it gives a proper compensation for the carrying of it. In other words, the corporation is subject to the jurisdiction and control of the sovereign power of the United States Government on that question for the purpose of carrying out its functions in behalf of the interests of the people, and the only limitation under the Constitution is that the services shall not be demanded of the corporation except for a fair compensation. If the legislative body fails to give the compensation that is due and thereby renders it confiscatory against the company, then there is a limit and an end to the power of the Government over the citizen or corporation. But so long as the Government does not confiscate the property of the railroad company in this mandate to perform a public service, it has the right under the Constitution to demand it.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. This power is not exercised by the Government under any claim of eminent domain—under constitutional provision that it can take private property for public use?

Mr. MOON. No; that comes in as a secondary proposition when the effect of the governmental action is confiscation.

Mr. COOPER. The Southern Railroad is a State corporation, a citizen of the State?

Mr. MOON. I do not know; of some State, I presume.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose the Government of the United States wishes the mail carried into a territory where there is no railroad, would it have the right to say to a private citizen, "You carry the mail with your horses and wagon at such a figure or we will fine you."

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; does not the gentleman realize the difference between dealing with a public-service corporation and a private citizen? The public-service corporation is clothed with the functions of government, and the fact that it is a creature of the Government enables both State and Federal Government to force it into this service in the interest of the people for the accomplishment of some purpose that will be of benefit to the people.

Mr. COOPER. Of course I understand the difference between a private citizen and a corporation. The Government can demand that a corporation perform the service of carrying mail at a particular figure that is not confiscatory; but can it impose a criminal sentence, a fine, upon that company if it does not perform the service?

Mr. MOON. I think the corporation that refuses to perform a public service raises the question of confiscation at its peril if it turns out to be wrong on the question. If it is right and the action of the Government is confiscatory, then of course the Government can not enforce the mandate. I want to say that I believe in the doctrine that the Government of the United States by its power and authority under the Constitution, and those powers that must necessarily be implied as inherent in the sovereignty, has the right to make any corporation that is a common carrier perform service for the Government, such as carrying the mails or a similar service, under the Constitution. If any railroad company in all of this land can say to this Government, "Whether you pay us a large price or a small price we stand upon our rights as a citizen—artificial though it may be—and we decline to do that as a corporation which a private citizen may have the right to decline to do"—if you are to enforce a doctrine of that sort, you nullify and destroy the power of your Government; and the Federal Government is not sovereign and can not protect itself, nor can it enforce the rights under the Constitution necessary for the interest and welfare of this people if you submit to a doctrine that it is powerless to control under those conditions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. We have the power to declare and control what are post roads and post routes, and under that power we have declared that all railroad companies are post roads and post routes. I have no doubt whatever that we have the power to require a railroad company to carry the mail, not the slightest, under our constitutional privilege. but that is quite a different thing from saying that we will fix on our side the rate at which they shall carry the mail. We have the power to compel them to render the service, and if we can not arrive by mutual agreement at rates to be paid, that would be adjusted by the courts on a claim against the Government, but here is a proposition which says that we have not only the power to require the mails to be carried, but the power to fix the rates ourselves, and then the power to fine the people if they fail to adopt our rates.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois does not announce the doctrine that the rate-making function belongs to the courts.

Mr. MANN. Certainly not.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Can not Congress fix the passenger and freight and post office or any other rate? Is not that a legislative function?

Mr. MANN. It is a legislative function.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I understood the gentleman to claim that the Congress had the power to say that the railroads should carry the mails, but whether the rate fixed by Congress would stand is for the courts to say.

Mr. MANN. It is for the courts.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The court could only decide that it is confiscatory and could not fix any rate.

Mr. MANN. I did not say that it could.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I did not think that the gentleman would say that.

Mr. MANN. If the railroad companies do something for us and we do not pay them, they can go to the courts with a claim against the Government. My friend knows that as well as I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, certainly, I agree with that proposition.

Mr. MANN. That is what I said.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I thought the gentleman was announcing here that the courts could fix the rates.

Mr. MANN. The courts do fix the rates for anything that has occurred. The gentleman does not bear in mind the distinction. The courts do fix the rate for that which is passed, but the courts under the Constitution do not have the power to fix the rates for the future. That is the distinction, which is well known to those who have been giving special study to this subject.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "company," in line 13 on page 46, insert the words "engaged in the business of operating a railway as a common carrier," and after the word "the," in line 14, insert the word "reasonable."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think we are all interested in having this section perfected, so as to make it valid and constitutional, if it can be done, and it seems to me that on its face it is of doubtful constitutionality, because, in the first place, it is too broad. It covers every railroad company whether it is operating a railroad or not. It might be said that that would be implied, and that by the process of judicial construction it would be held to apply only to a company engaged in operating a railroad, but we may as well make it so plain as to remove any doubt. There are hundreds of railroad companies that do not operate railroads. For instance, in my State there is a railroad company that operated several lines for 30 years, and then it leased those lines. It is still a railroad company, and it owns the lines, but it has leased them to another operating company, and to say that that company which is not engaged in business as a common carrier should carry the mail, and because of failure to do so be subject to fine, would be absurd. It is not necessary to do that. We can make this plain that a railroad company that operates a railroad as a common carrier is what is understood.

There are a number of private railroads; I know of one railroad in my State, which is a logging railroad, and it has not been opened to the public. They do not carry freight as common carriers. They have purchased their right of way, and they own it, and it is operated in the interest of the owners, and they do not profess to be common carriers. Now, it would not be reasonable to compel them to carry the mails, and we are running up against all sorts of objections in that way if we leave the language blank. Another thing. This provides:

That it shall be unlawful for any railroad company to refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do.

Now, I think that the objection that has been raised to this on the ground that the rate prescribed by law might be confiscatory would be avoided if we insert the word "reasonable" before the word "rates," so that it would read:

At such reasonable rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do.

Without this amendment it seems to me that this provision is of doubtful constitutionality and might therefore injure the efficacy of the whole provision. I myself in committee suggested that it would be better to make it the duty—that is, to say that it shall be the duty—of every company operating a railroad to carry the mails, if it were a common carrier, and simply leave it to the courts to enforce that duty by injunction, mandamus, or something of that kind, instead of having a criminal penalty against the corporation, which is not the ordinary course of business. The penalty of a fine of $5,000 hardly seems applicable to a case of this kind. If we are going to write in this section a clause in the nature of a definition of a crime, it seems to me that it ought to be plain. By inserting the word "reasonable" before the word "rates" we make it plain we are aiming at the railroad company that actually operates a railroad as a common carrier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlemn has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, of course this act does not propose to take any action against any but railroad companies that engage in the carrying of mails or engage in a common-carrier business. There might be a little logging railroad through the country hauling to a sawmill, or things of that sort, and this act could have no application to that sort of a corporation. Now, as to the question of reasonable rates. If the gentleman opens up that question, he opens up the whole field of contention in reference to railway rates and would nullify every section practically of this act by saying that every company in the United States shall be in litigation by an injunction, or some other process, against the performance of this act. The language is right:

To refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do.

Are we simply sent here to say "reasonable rates" and leave it to all the courts to settle this litigation in every single instance with every railroad company? We want to exercise some virile power in this Government. We want to say to the railroad companies, "We have got the power to make you carry these mails; we have fixed the rates and you have got to carry them at the rates we fix. If you do not like it, if you think we confiscate your property, then there are the courts, here is the Constitution"——

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for a vote on this section.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman concedes there is no judicial authority for the contention you could fine a railroad company for refusing to carry the mails; that has never been determined.

Mr. MOON. Why, there is no use in discussing that matter with the gentleman if he does not understand the difference in the power of the Government in enforcing its action by legislative order or mandate and the right of a citizen under the Constitution in the courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the unexpended balances of the appropriations for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service, by the act of March 9, 1914, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, are hereby made available for the purposes of this act.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, lines 20, 21, and 22, strike out the words:
"By the act of March 9, 1914, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department."
And in line 23 on the same page strike out the words "fifteen, and for other purposes" and insert the word "sixteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MANN. How would that read? I ask to have it reported as it would be if amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraph as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the unexpended balances of the appropriations for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, are hereby made available for the purposes of this act.

Mr. MANN. That should be then "of this section." It should read "available for the purposes of this section." That is what you want.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is, the appropriation in the bill shall be made available for purposes of this section.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That amendment completely changes the paragraph. Do I understand the purpose of the paragraph as amended will be to make the unexpended balances of the appropriations in this bill——

Mr. MOON. It reads:

That the unexpended balances of the appropriations for inland transportation for railroad routes and for railway post-office car service by the act of March 9——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is stricken out.

Mr. MOON. That is stricken out, and we put in place of it:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. MANN. The words "unexpended balances" should be stricken out, so that it would read "appropriations for inland transportation" carried by this act.

Mr. MOON. I move to strike out the words "unexpended balances."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 18, strike out the words "unexpended balances of the."

Mr. MOON. And change "act" to "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 24, at the end of the paragraph, strike out the word "act" and insert the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I think this question is not complete, and I want to ask to have the section reported again as amended.

Mr. STEENERSON. With that understanding I will yield.

Mr. CULLOP. That is all I care for. May we have the paragraph reported now as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraph as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, beginning with line 18, the paragraph as amended will read: "That the appropriations for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post-office car service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, are hereby made available for the purposes of this section."

Mr. STEENERSON. It has been said that this new plan of railway mail pay has been recommended by a commission that investigated the subject very thoroughly, and that is true. I understand, however, the rates recommended by this commission are higher than those contained in this bill. If I understood the remarks of the chairman in general debate on this bill, wherein he discussed the railway mail pay feature, he has a very sanguine idea of the results of this new system of railway mail pay. And he estimated the saving by this new plan at something like $10,000,000 a year. Of course, that is a "consummation devoutly to be wished," provided, of course, that the rates that we pay to those who do the work are compensatory or reasonable. But there is an implication contained in the statement that I do not feel that I can pass by without answering, and that is this, that if the railway mail pay of to-day is excessive to the extent of $10,000,000 or $12,000,000, as stated by the chairman, then it is the fault of the legislation that has been enacted heretofore.

Now, I have served on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for many years, and during the first five or six years of my service on that committee we reported several bills, and they became laws, for the reduction of railway mail pay; and they operated to that effect. As a matter of fact, railway mail pay has been gradually reduced, if we compare it with the total expenditures of the Post Office Department. And I think that way of comparing them is fair, for if a man, for instance, figures out his expenses of living, he says, "Well, I spend so much for clothing, I spend so much for food, I spend so much for amusement," and he figures up that perhaps he has been extravagant in one item, and therefore he says, "I must curtail that item." Now, then, the Post Office Department spends money chiefly for clerical help and for carriage. They collect money for postage, and they collect that money according to the weight of the article put into the mail. If a letter weighs an ounce they collect 2 cents on it, and if it weighs more they collect more, according to the number of ounces. If a package weighs so much, they collect a certain rate. So we charge postage according to the weight of the article.

Some 40 or 50 years ago the system of railway mail pay that we now have was adopted, and it was based on the same reasoning, that the reasonable way to pay was by the pound, or by the ton, according to the distance that the railways moved an article. Under that system of pay, by weight and distance, I find, upon looking at the statistics, that in 1883 we spent 32.2 per cent of our total postal expenditure for railway transportation; in 1888 we spent 34.5 per cent; in 1893, 35.5 per cent; in 1898, 35.4 per cent; in 1908, 23.6 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. The cause of that gradual reduction was the revision of the railway mail pay that Congress enacted. It was reduced the next year, 1909, from 23.6 to 22.4, and the next year, 1910, to 21 per cent. It was the same in 1911, but in 1912 it was reduced to 20 per cent, and in 1913 it was 19.6 per cent of the total expenditures. So that there has been a gradual reduction in the amount of the expenditures for railway service as compared with the total postal expenditures.

Now, I am not opposing this railway mail scheme, and I shall not oppose it. I shall vote for it because of the representations of the Post Office Department to the effect that it is such a desirable thing to have. I shall give it the benefit of the doubt, but I can not share in their hope of reducing the aggregate of railway pay to any great extent by that system.

One of the things that I see is that in the new system the amount of pay that the railroads will receive will be determined to a very much greater extent than now by the discretion of the officials who administer the law, because it will be dependent upon the authorization of space by the Postmaster General. It will not be, as stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, a government of law, but a government of men to that extent—to a much greater extent than it is now. The pay will be governed by the amount of space authorized, and they may authorize more than they need, or they may authorize less than they need; and I fear that there will not always be a man in the Post Office Department that will look out for the interests of the people as carefully as the present head of that department does in this regard, and there might be a friend of the railroads at the head of the department who would allow too much. And therefore I do not anticipate that there will be such a great saving as is anticipated. Besides, I am reminded of the fact that this commission, which we have heard eulogized by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TUTTLE], of which he was a very distinguished member, claim to have found as a matter of fact that the present railway mail pay was not excessive. It was not claimed by that commission that we were paying anything too much, and therefore it is hardly to be expected that the prophecy of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], that we shall save ten million or twelve million dollars by this new law, will be realized. The estimate of the department under the new plan is about the same as under the present. I want to go on record now as saying that I fear, when the accounts for the future are rendered under this law, they will not show such a gradual reduction of railway mail pay as is shown by this table, which I will make a part of my remarks. If you can reduce it, you are entitled to the credit, but I desire to resent the imputation involved, that we are paying any great amount more than we ought to pay at the present time. I do not think we are. The proofs submitted on that question do not support any such claim.

Comparative statement of expenditures for Postal Service.

Year.	Total for Postal Service.	For railway post office car service and railway transportation.	Per cent of of railroad expenditure to total.
1883	$43,282,944.43	$13,887,800.00	32.2
1888	56,468,315.20	19,524,959.15	34.5
1893	81,581,681.33	28,910,195.30	25.5
1898	98,033,523.61	34,703,847.46	35.4
1903	138,784,487.97	41,886,848.59	30.1
1908	208,351,886.15	49,404,763.05	23.6
1909	221,004,102.89	49,606,440.16	22.4
1910	229,977,224.50	49,302,217.46	21.8
1911	237,648,926.68	50,910,261.68	21.0
1912	248,525,450.08	50,703,323.02	20.4
1913	262,067,541.33	51,466,030.62	19.6

From 1908 to 1913 the postal revenues increased in round numbers $54,000,000, while railroad pay for transportation of mail only increased $2,000,000. A good showing for economy, it seems to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's order No. 7720, of December 18, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 47, line 3, by striking out the words "seventy-seven hundred and twenty, of December eighteenth" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "seventy-three hundred and forty-nine, of July twenty-fifth."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 47, line 3, strike out the words "seventy-seven hundred and twenty, of December eighteenth" and insert in lieu thereof "seventy-three hundred and forty-nine, of July twenty-fifth."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's order No. 7720, of December 18, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages effective from January 1, 1914, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after January 1, 1914, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding 1 per cent thereof per annum.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, there are some errors in that paragraph that I want to correct. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 47, line 13, strike out the word "order" and insert in lieu thereof "orders."

In line 14, after the word "twenty," insert the following words: "and seventy-seven hundred and twenty-one."

In lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "effective from January 1, 1914" and insert in lieu thereof "and admitting books to the parcel-post classification."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FERRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to ask a change of reference of three Senate bills that were sent to the wrong committee.

The SPEAKER. What are the numbers of them?

Mr. RUSSELL. The bills are S. 1991, 3509, and 6152. These bills were referred to the Invalid Pensions Committee, and they should go to the Military Affairs Committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Let me make a statement. The understanding—which I suppose will be carried out—is that when we adjourn to-morrow we will adjourn until Monday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Who made the understanding?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is all right.

Mr. STEENERSON. What is the necessity for meeting at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. If we are going to adjourn over two days on account of New Year's, I think it is quite proper that we should meet a little earlier to-morrow.

Mr. STEENERSON. But this bill is nearly finished.

Mr. MOON. There are seven pages of it left.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And there is another bill to come up.

Mr. STEENERSON. I should like to be here, but it is pretty hard for me to get here at 11 o'clock. I want to take my usual 3-mile walk in the morning and attend to my correspondence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest to the gentleman that he get up an hour earlier and walk 7 miles.

Mr. STEENERSON. I can not see any great exigency for meeting at 11 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unless we can finish this bill to-morrow and go on with another bill, we will have to work on New Year's Day.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; we ought to finish this bill to-morrow and begin on the next one.

The SPEAKER. Is there any proposition with reference to adjourning over?

Mr. MANN. No; that is not before the House. The request is for unanimous consent to meet at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 6939. An act to reimburse Edward B. Kelley for moneys expended while superintendent of the Rosebud Indian Agency, in South Dakota.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, December 31, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Tres Palacios River, Tex. (H. Doc. No. 1464); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

2. Letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting report on land withdrawals from settlement, location, sale, or entry under the provisions of act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stats., 847) (H. Doc. No. 1465); to the Committee on the Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

3. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Navy submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 1466); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. Letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the 12 months ending October 31, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1467); to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed, with illustration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17388) creating an additional land district in the State of California, embracing lands contained in the county of Imperial, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1251), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res.

382) authorizing the President to extend invitations to other nations to send representatives to the International Dry Farming Congress, to be held at Denver, Colo., September 27 to October 8, inclusive, 1915, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1252), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. BROWNING, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1060) fixing the date of reenlistment of Gustav Hertfelter, first-class fireman, United States Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1253), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WITHERSPOON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11927) for the relief of Matthew McDonald, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1254); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20238) granting a pension to William E. Martin; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 20251) granting a pension to George H. Dry; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 20240) granting a pension to Louisa Fleming; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 31, 1914.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, December 29, 1914.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Presiding Officer, Mr. SWANSON.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill and have it printed in the RECORD. It deals with the development of water power, a subject that is now before Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON). Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As the Senator from Utah is the only person who is now on the floor to object——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Georgia objects, I certainly shall not ask leave to introduce the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not going to object; but I say as the Senator from Utah makes the request, there is no one left to object, because we rely on him especially to prevent an irregular mode of procedure.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I withdraw my request.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not object. I think the Senator does a great deal of good by interposing an objection in such cases.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. GRONNA. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Page	Sutherland
Borah	James	Perkins	Swanson
Bryan	Jones	Pittman	Thomas
Burton	Kern	Reed	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lane	Robinson	Townsend
Clapp	Lodge	Sheppard	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Simmons	Walsh
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.	White
Dillingham	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Gallinger	Oliver	Smoot
Gronna	Overman	Sterling

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to state regarding the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] that he is absent on public business and is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on all questions.

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] on account of illness in his family, and also to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who is absent from the city, is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on all votes. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence from the city of my colleague [Mr. WARREN]. He has a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WEEKS], who is absent from the Senate, has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators and Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. SAULSBURY answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, House bill 6060.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. For what purpose?

Mr. OVERMAN. To report from the Committee on Appropriations the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. That is out of order at this time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to submit the report by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under clause 2 of Rule VII it is made the duty of the Chair to enforce the rule without having his attention directed to it. There is a specific provision in the rule which prevents the presentation of the report at this time. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no thought of making an argument in regard to the illiteracy test. I have said my say and made my argument on that subject so many times that I have no intention of repeating it. I think it would weary the Senate to have me repeat it, and I am sure it would weary me.

Nor do I intend to go into a discussion of the arguments which have been made against the test. Speaking, however, from considerable familiarity with those arguments, extending over many years, I think I may say that I have never heard them better put than during this debate or with more force or with more apparent pathos. To the philosophic observer with a sense of humor there is something very interesting in listening to the eulogies on ignorance and illiteracy which we have heard so eloquently delivered in the Senate during the last few days.

If there is anything which is more characteristic of the American people than another it is their devotion to the cause of education. We believe in the importance of education almost to the point of being superstitious about it. There is no limit to the money which is given from the public treasury by States, municipalities, and the Nation for the cause of education. There is no limit to the amount of benefaction which is poured out for education from private sources. We believe that education is important to intelligent citizenship. That is one of the great fundamental beliefs of the American people.

I believe there are only five States in which we have not compulsory education. In many States of the Union it is a provision of the constitution that an American citizen can not vote unless he is able to read and write. We do not hesitate to put that test on the American citizen, but we seem to shrink from applying it to the foreigner coming to the country.

Mr. President, it seems to me that some of these arguments carried to their logical conclusion, as I have listened to them here with great interest, would mean that we ought to find out who could read and write and then to exclude those who were possessed of those accomplishments. That is where some of them lead. We are told that all the anarchists who come here can read and write, and from that there seems to be a hasty conclusion drawn that because anarchists generally can read and write therefore people who can read and write are generally anarchists, which is rather a broad jump in argument. In the same way we are told that most of the criminals can read and write. It is difficult to conceive that because criminals can read and write therefore most persons who can read and write are criminals.

Mr. President, though it is interesting to notice this contrast between our opinion of education as applied to our own people and our opinion of education as applied to foreigners, the fact is that the real argument is rarely made. It has been made once in this debate. It was made by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] with his usual force and effectiveness when he said that the passage of this illiteracy test would cost votes. That is a real argument. I do not think it is an argument that affects the merits of the question, but it is a real and not a mock argument. There is something to be said upon this point on both sides. It is erroneous, in my judgment, to suppose that the mass of the American people object to the literacy test. I think it is shown by their constitutions and their laws that they do not. But I do not think we ought to decide this question quite in that way by our guesses at the number of votes involved. I think the question ought to be decided on its merits.

As I have said, I am not going to argue the details of the provision at all, but simply state what the purpose of it is. Hitherto our immigration legislation has been altogether selective. We have had no restrictive legislation at all. The restriction caused by our selective legislation has been merely incidental. There has been a very widespread desire in this country, evidenced by the action of the great labor organizations, farmers' organizations, and many leagues formed for the promotion of the restriction of immigration, in favor of restricting immigration.

Those who are opposed to all restriction of immigration ought to vote against the illiteracy test, for it is a restrictive measure. It is not put in on the theory of keeping out a criminal or an anarchist. That has nothing to do with it. The law provides against the admission of those persons in other clauses specifically. The object of the literacy test is to restrict the amount of immigration coming to this country.

I shall not rehearse the argument so ably and completely made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and others on the need of restriction. It was shown by the protracted investigation of the Immigration Commission generally to be wise on economic grounds, to speak of no other. But assuming for the moment that restriction is desirable, the next thing is to adopt a method of restriction which shall exclude as many undesirable persons as possible and as few desirable, and no form of restriction can be devised which will exclude only undesirable and admit only desirable.

That is out of the question. The purpose to be attained, as I have said, is the one that will exclude as nearly as possible the undesirable and as few as possible who are desirable. After years of investigation by committees of Congress and by commissions, one after another, after many investigations and after considering every form of restriction suggested, the conclusion has been reached by nearly all competent investigators that the illiteracy test restricts immigration with as small a loss of desirable immigrants as possible and with as large an exclusion of undesirable immigrants as can be practically attained. The investigations show very clearly that the tendency of the illiterates over the literates to congest in the large cities of the eastern coast is very marked. That is but one of the many reasons which have led to the adoption of this test. The proof of the lowering of the American standards of life and wages is furnished by the report of the Immigration Commission. That is another great economic argument for restriction. I think in voting on the test it should be kept in mind that its intention is restrictive; that it is not aimed to keep immigrants out because they are ignorant and illiterate simply, but because ignorance and illiteracy give, on the whole, the best test for the restriction of the most undesirable immigrants.

It is proposed to amend the bill in the clause which carries the test. This amendment, Mr. President, would in large measure destroy the value of the illiteracy test. In my opinion it would be better to take the test out of the bill altogether if the Senate is against any measure of restriction than to put in an amendment of this sort. This amendment at once, by its very phraseology, produces most serious inequalities in the law. It says that the persecution is to "be evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations."

In the Turkish Empire—what remains of it—there is a strong religious discrimination, which takes effect at intervals in the killing of Christians. The Armenian massacres of some years ago are familiar, and if there is any country in the world where there is discriminatory legislation leading to religious persecution it is within the borders of the Turkish Empire. This, therefore, would relieve Armenians and Syrians and people from Asia Minor from the illiteracy test, but it would impose it upon the people of Italy, where, I understand there is no discriminatory religious legislation of any sort or kind.

The illiteracy test in regard to Great Britain and Ireland is not of consequence, because the percentage of illiteracy is so low that it would exclude practically no immigrants from those countries; but, at the same time, England has an established church. A certain number of the prelates of that church have the right to sit in the upper House of Parliament. That is distinctly discriminatory against all who are not members of the established church—dissenters, Roman Catholics, and others. Therefore this amendment would exempt from the illiteracy test the people of England, and of Wales also, until the church is disestablished there, and would apply it to the people of Ireland and Scotland. This illustrates some of the difficulties that would come from a law framed in that way. You would relieve certain nations and certain races from your illiteracy test, and you would apply it to others. You would make it unequal; you would come in conflict, I am rather inclined to think, with the favored-nation clause in principle, if not literally.

As to political persecution, that is extremely vague. We have tried to take care of that in a general provision of the proposed law, but this amendment to the illiteracy clause in the bill as it is framed would be worse than destructive of the test as it stands in the House bill. It would partially destroy it; it would leave it in force against certain nations and remove it from others.

Therefore I think, Mr. President, that this amendment ought to be defeated. If the Senate then comes to the main question according as they believe that restriction of immigration is necessary or unnecessary, whether, by the result of investigation or otherwise, this is the best method of restriction or not, they should determine whether to leave the clause in the bill or to take it out. If it is to stay in the bill, it ought to stay there in substantially the form in which it is now there. If it is to be taken out, it had better be taken out altogether than to put in an amendment of this kind, which can only lead to all sorts of complications, which would create a law that would fall unequally, which could never be justly enforced, and which would give to some, at least, of the undesirable forms of immigration a chance to come in while it excluded some of the desirable forms which we want to admit.

This is all, Mr. President, that I desire to say. There is no use of entering into any general argument; but I wish to record my opposition to this amendment, and then, after the Senate dispose of that, I hope they will dispose of the main question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the central idea which I had in mind when I consented to introduce this amendment, on which occasion I made the statement that it was prepared by another, was to extend the exemption from the literacy test to those who sought asylum in America as a refuge from persecution. I did so because I then believed, and am now confirmed in the belief, that the exemption reported by the committee is not broad enough to cover all cases of persecution or to accord with what I understand to have been the national policy upon this subject ever since the origin of the Government. I can conceive of no reason which justifies an exemption for those who desire to come here in order to escape religious persecution which is not equally applicable to those who are the victims of political or racial persecution, which is quite as intolerable as and sometimes more cruel than religious persecution.

I believe thoroughly in a literacy test, provided one can be secured which is consistent with the right of asylum to all peoples except those which are specifically excluded for other reasons. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], having charge of the bill, has said that if this amendment is adopted it virtually destroys the force and the efficacy of the literacy test. I am not prepared to accept that statement; but if it is true it is the strongest argument that has been uttered upon this floor against the inclusion in the bill of any such test whatever, for I deny, Mr. President, that there can be any consistency whatever or any justice in a regulation which gives exemption to the object of religious persecution, but denies it to the object of political or racial persecution. It is persecution that we desire to exempt from the operation of this clause, whether it be of a religious or of a political character, and when we begin to discriminate between the bases or causes of persecution in the application of a national doctrine we establish a condition that is absolutely foreign to what I have always understood to be the purpose and the policy of this Government with reference to immigration.

But the criticisms which have just been made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] of the concluding paragraph of the amendment are of great force. I have been impressed from the inception of this debate with the general character and consequently the general scope of the exemption which would be created by that clause if it were enacted into legislation. I can perceive very clearly that, as the Senator says, it would operate as an exemption of some nations or races as an entirety, while the restrictive clause would be equally universal as applied to others, and, as a consequence, I hesitate, Mr. President, to give my assent to that clause, although it is a part of the amendment which I have offered. At one time I suggested its withdrawal, but I did not insist upon the suggestion for the reason that another Senator requested that it should not be pressed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been giving more or less study to this amendment, as I desire to vote for as liberal a provision as is consistent, and I listened with interest to the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I will ask the Senator from Colorado if he does not think it will be quite an advance—and perhaps cover the matter sufficiently—if the Senator simply adds the words "or political" to the provision in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, so as to read "religious or political persecution"?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator is not aware of the fact that I have accepted two additions which have been suggested to the amendment as I sent it to the Secretary's desk. It now reads:

That the following classes of persons—

Then comes an amendment—

when otherwise qualified for admission under the laws of the United States shall be exempt—

And so forth. The other amendment which I have accepted is the insertion of the words "of racial" after the word "political," on the first line of the second page.

Personally I should be satisfied with this amendment as amended, with the excision of its last clause, which, as I have said, is subject to the criticism which has been made of it so ably and incisively by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator read the last clause to which he has just referred?

Mr. THOMAS. It reads:

Whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations.

I was going to add, however, that I shall not ask to have that part of the amendment withdrawn; but, in the event the amendment in its present condition is not adopted, then I shall offer it again with the amendments that have been accepted to it and with the exclusion of the clause which I have just read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to have the amendment stated as it is now perfected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, beginning in line 6, it is proposed to strike out:

That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they emigrated from the country of which they were last permanent residents solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the following classes of persons, when otherwise qualified for admission under the laws of the United States, shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious, political, or racial persecution, whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. May I ask, where a section has an amendment addressed to it and also a motion to strike out the whole section, which takes precedence—the motion to strike out the whole section or an amendment of the section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The text must be perfected before the motion to strike out is in order under general parliamentary law. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote nay.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. CUMMINS (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KENYON] is absent from the Senate and also from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. SAULSBURY (when the name of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was called). I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and that he is paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. If present, the Senator from Virginia would vote nay.

Mr. OLIVER (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is absent to-day on account of sickness. If he were present, he would vote nay. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but on this proposition they are agreed, and the senior Senator from Mississippi is therefore at liberty to vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and will vote. I vote yea.

Mr. REED (when Mr. STONE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. STONE] is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of the health of members of his family. During his absence he is paired with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

I take this occasion to state, further, that I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and will allow my vote in the affirmative to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. On that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). In view of the announcement made by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], I feel free to vote, notwithstanding my pair with the senior Senator from that State. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], who has not voted. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], but I understand that he would vote as I have voted on this question. Consequently I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is not present and has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN];

The junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]; and

The junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

I was also requested to state that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family.

The result was announced—yes 26, nays 34, as follows:

So Mr. THOMAS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will ask the chairman of the committee to yield in order to allow me to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to report what is known as the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object, Mr. President. The trouble is that if reports are allowed——

Mr. GALLINGER and other Senators. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for. Nothing is in order at present but the pending bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Colorado offers the amendment just voted upon, with the exception that the words at the end thereof—whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations—are stricken therefrom, so that the amendment now reads:

On page 9, lines 6 to 12, strike out the words in the House bill and in lieu thereof insert:

"That the following classes of persons, when otherwise qualified for admission under the laws of the United States, shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States to avoid religious, political, or racial persecution."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the amendment as now presented is the amendment upon which the Senate has just taken a vote, except that the last clause, objections to which were so forcibly presented during the discussion of the amendment itself, is eliminated.

I have only to say to the Senate that if it is our sincere purpose to permit those who are suffering from persecution to avail themselves of an exemption clause to the literacy test, it would seem that consistency and justice require that whatever the cause of the persecution, whether it be religious or political or racial, or any two of them, or the three of them combined, the fact of the persecution itself should be the test of the application of the exemption, and not the basis of that test. Now, if we are going to be consistent, and if America is still to be the asylum of those who seek its shores as a refuge from persecution, then the amendment as presented should be accepted by the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only long enough to state a proposition.

The bill as reported provides—

That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officers or to the Secretary of Labor that they emigrated from the country of which they were last permanent residents solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution.

To that is added, by the amendment, words which would include those who are fleeing from political persecution or racial persecution.

Mr. President, either the clause in the bill ought to be stricken out or this amendment should be adopted, in my humble judgment. I say that for this reason: As far as my knowledge extends, there is not a single country that in modern times has boldly started upon a policy of religious persecution. They have not said, "We are attacking these inhabitants of our country because of their religion." That has been the real cause, undoubtedly, but always the governmental authorities have assigned some other cause. So when an immigrant is required to show that he is fleeing to escape religious persecution, if he is limited to strict and technical proof, he can not make it. If you do not adopt this amendment, you ought bravely and frankly to strike out the language of the bill itself and not pretend to be granting asylum to those who seek to escape religious persecution, well knowing at the time that probably not a single man can prove himself absolutely within that exemption.

What man in the Senate can point to a single instance in modern times when any Government has by law persecuted any class of people for religion's sake? Nevertheless, we know that in many instances they have been persecuted because they are of a certain religion, but the law of the country does not say so, and the authorities of the country proceed upon some other pretense.

Now, let us either be brave enough to strike out of the bill language that means nothing for practical purposes and say to all the world, "We close the door in the face of those who flee to escape persecution," or else let us pass an amendment that will permit these creatures to come in.

I have one further observation. We are taking a step here to-day, if we repudiate this amendment, that is a repudiation of the whole course of American history. We propose, if we repudiate this amendment, to close the doors of this country to those men who seek asylum from political persecution. We propose to say to the immigrant who may be fleeing here for his life from an oppressor who may conquer his country within the next few months—aye, who may have already conquered his country—"You shall go back to your death, to the land where it awaits you, for no other crime than a political crime." That is a reversal of American policy for a century. It is a reversal of all our precedents, all our customs, all our pretensions, and it is a policy that is, in my opinion, unworthy of the American people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I spoke briefly in regard to the amendment then pending I was not aware that the word "racial" had been inserted. Otherwise I should have said something about that. The word "racial" loosens the provision more even than "discriminatory laws." It produces the same inequality. We want to be very careful before we insert that word in our legislation. It would not be difficult for the Hindus to show that they were subjected, some of them, as they think, to racial persecution and that they were discriminated against. The Senate wants to be extremely careful before it loosens the provision in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is necessarily absent, and withhold my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], who is absent, and withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). With the same statement regarding my pair and its transfer that I previously made, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CUMMINS (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KENYON] is absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. OLIVER (when Mr. PENROSE's name was called). I make the same announcement with regard to my colleague [Mr. PENROSE] as on the former vote. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has just been called from the Chamber and will be unable to be present during the remainder of the vote. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. If the Senator from Delaware were present and entitled to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement made on the previous vote and add to it that since that time a telegram has been received from the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] which relieves me from my pair on this question. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], which I transfer to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA. When my name was called and I announced my pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] I did not feel that I was at liberty to vote. I am informed that if present he would vote "nay," and I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). Before the result is announced I desire to state that I will allow my vote to stand, but I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the previous vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—26.

Borah	La Follette	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Lane	Perkins	Thomas
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Pittman	Thornton

So Mr. THOMAS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move as an amendment that the words "or political" be inserted after the word "religious" on the twelfth line of the ninth page of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. So as to read how?

Mr. O'GORMAN. So as to read:

All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Labor that they emigrated from the country of which they were last permanent residents solely for the purpose of escaping from religious or political persecution.

It omits the racial exemption which has just been voted down by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. O'GORMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair heretofore made, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Making the same statement as previously, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing the transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] and withhold my vote.

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair as before.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the former roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as before and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I make the same transfer of my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] that I made on the preceding vote and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH. As heretofore announced, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. If the Senator from Delaware were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Borah	Hughes	Martine, N. J.	Reed
Brandegee	Kern	Myers	Shafroth
Chamberlain	La Follette	Norris	Smith, Md.

So Mr. O'GORMAN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. On December 17 I gave notice that I would offer an amendment, and I propose it now. While it has been practically voted on several times this morning, it has been coupled with other conditions. The amendment that I offer is stripped of all other conditions except to strike out lines 10, 11, and 12, and in line 13 the word "Provided."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, commencing with line 10, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. I merely want to call attention to the fact that the amendment strikes out the literacy test, but leaves in all the machinery for it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that the motion I made to strike out from the section is very similar to that presented by the Senator from New Jersey, and I desire to inform the Senate that the motion of the Senator from New Jersey I will accept as likewise providing for the amendment I intended to offer, and thus avoid the necessity of having another vote upon my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that the amendment proposed by him simply strikes out the clause known as the literacy test and leaves all the balance of the section and all the mechinery untouched.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am very well satisfied that the temper of the Senate will strike out everything in that direction, and so I am quite willing to let it go. If you strike out the words I propose to eliminate, I do not care how much machinery you have left in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey demands the yeas and nays upon agreeing to his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I understand, this proposition is to strike out the literacy test. That is the object of the Senator from New Jersey in offering it?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes, sir; that is my purpose.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can not support an amendment which has for its object the elimination of the literacy test. I have voted in favor of the amendments offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], because they stated a principle with which I am in accord, a principle which has been observed by our Government since its creation, namely, that this land may be the home of those moral, healthy, normal men and women, without regard to their education, who have fled here from their native countries to escape religious or political persecution. Our forefathers belonged to that class. The bill recognizes the justice of making an exception in behalf of victims of religious persecution, and I can see no reasons which plead for them that are not equally effective in behalf of political or racial refugees from persecution. I believe in restricting immigration. We have been receiving more immigrants than we have beneficially assimilated. The literacy test will not insure all desirable immigrants; it will not exclude all undesirable aliens; but with the other qualifications included in the bill it will lessen materially the number of immigrants who are undesirable.

I shall not discuss the harmful effects of our immigration upon American labor. That phase of the subject has been fully presented. Indeed, I shall not attempt to make any argument, but desire simply to enter my protest against much of the alleged argument offered by the opponents of the educational test for the admission of aliens. Why, ignorance has been lauded as the virtue and education as the disability. It would almost seem that some Senators would prefer that the prohibition be against those who could read and write rather than against the illiterate.

The corner stone of our Republic is education. The fundamental law of every State provides for free schools. Compulsory educational laws are forced upon our people. We believe in education and that the Republic can only exist permanently in the hands of an educated electorate. The fathers, when they provided for free schools, were working not for present political favors, were governed not by temporary expedients, but were looking far ahead and building for the future.

This Republic is but an experiment. Its success depends upon the character and the intelligence of the men and women who form and constitute it.

More and more the people are coming into the actual exercise of the powers of government. The direct primary, the initiative and referendum are being demanded, if not by the people at least by the politicians. Can an illiterate man know as well as the literate one? Is it safe to trust the functions of government, including the making and repealing of laws, to foreigners who can not read those laws, but who must rely upon another for information and advice? Ignorance in the hands of immoral intelligence is a menace to the Republic.

Just in proportion as the powers of government are assumed by the people just in that proportion ought the educational test to be raised. I realize, of course, that the admitted immigrant does not, by virtue of his admission, become entitled to the elective franchise, but to all practical purposes he does. I want to raise the standard of citizenship, and I believe, as I always have believed, that education, like righteousness, exalteth a nation.

I believe that the literacy test in the bill will not be as beneficial to our people as its proponents claim; neither will it work the hardships predicted by its opponents; but it is a recognition of the principle of civilization and progress, and, therefore, I can not vote to eliminate it.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I shall vote for the literacy section of the bill which has been previously approved by both Houses of Congress, because I believe that the indiscriminate immigration that has been coming to this country during the last 10 or 15 years should be restricted until we can better assimilate or Americanize those who have come in such large numbers in the time I have mentioned.

Therefore, believing that the best interests of this country demand a restriction of foreign immigration, I am in favor of the literacy test, because that operates as a restriction to some extent, and I think the restriction can properly be applied to illiterates.

It is true that illiteracy does not necessarily imply lack of morality or the desire to be a lawbreaker.

It is also true that illiteracy naturally tends to prevent a foreigner from acquiring a proper conception of American institutions as soon as a literate could acquire it.

It is also true that the illiterates on account of their ignorance can be more easily influenced in the direction of lawlessness by designing men, and also more readily influenced by political demagogues.

Everyone who has looked into the matter of this large foreign immigration during the time I have mentioned knows, or ought to know, that the two principal causes inducing it were the efforts of foreign steamship companies and the American employers of cheap labor, each working for their own selfish interests.

I am aware that this country is largely indebted for its development to the immigration that came here from Europe in former times; but that was an immigration of a different nature from the immigration which has been largely coming of late years, and devoted itself to other pursuits than the present kind of immigration does.

The fact that in former times and under different conditions in this country unrestricted immigration was permitted is no argument in favor of permitting unrestricted immigration now.

While I feel a natural sympathy for aliens who hope to better their condition by coming to this country, I do not recognize that this country is under any obligation to admit foreigners to its privileges just because these foreigners wish to enjoy those privileges.

Still less is this country under any obligation to admit them if their admittance might have a tendency to injuriously affect the well-being of her own citizens.

I consider that my first duty is to my own country, and I propose to discharge it according to my best judgment, without regard to the possible political effect on myself or on the party with which I am identified.

I regret that the amendments to the literacy test which have been voted on this morning have been defeated by the Senate. They were amendments for which I voted and for which I stand. Nevertheless, because they have been voted down is no reason why I should be justified in voting against the literacy test which, in my judgment, embodies generally a wise provision of law. Especially is this so when the sentiment of the Senate very clearly shows that the literacy test will be sustained, no matter whether I vote against it or for it.

I also feel some comfort in the fact that, in my judgment, the Jews in those countries of Europe for whom this amendment was particularly intended will not, after the conclusion of the present European war, suffer the persecution in the future which they have suffered in the past, no matter what side may be victorious at its termination.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, this debate, like many another, has drifted far wide of the real merits of the controversy.

This bill as it passed the other House contained what has been called a literacy test. At the same time, by excepting those who come here on account of religious persecution it plainly recognized the asylum principle in our immigration laws. It placed among the other tests literacy, and then provided that aliens coming here might be exempt from that test if they could prove to the satisfaction of certain officers that they had come here on account of religious persecution. There we have the retention of the literacy test, the recognition of the asylum principle, and the extension of that exemption to a particular race.

I have voted this morning for certain amendments not to enlarge this exemption, but as I pointed out yesterday to make this exemption plain, so that there might be no question of what it meant. Having done my utmost to make this exemption plain, and being unable to make it any plainer than it is, and the bill clearly recognizing the principle of asylum extended to this particular people who come from other lands where they have no voice in their government, I could not, of course, vote for the proposed amendment to strike out the so-called literacy test. I do not believe it is the ultima Thule test of citizenship. On the other hand, we ought to encourage education and discourage illiteracy. I believe this bill is the happy medium in placing the literacy test in the law and at the same time recognizing that the principle of asylum must still prevail in our immigration laws, only I regret that the exemption might not have been put in terms so plain as to lead to no confusion, as I urged yesterday.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am going to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey for the reason that I am of the opinion that large numbers of laboring men are brought into this country for the sole purpose of beating down the price paid to laborers already here; in other words, that American labor is suffering from a competition which is not a natural one, and that, through the means mentioned by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] yesterday of flaring circulars and false inducements presented to ignorant people in Europe, they are brought here by interested persons, steamship companies perhaps, and passed on into the hands of large interests which use them, the one against the other, to beat down the price of labor, and afterwards prevent them from combining the one with the other to better their own condition. Believing that the literacy test, which in itself amounts to but little and may be avoided I suspect, is partly a safeguard—for that reason and for no other—I am going to vote against the amendment. I believe that in fairness we owe it to the people of this country to allow them to have a fair opportunity with an equal chance to earn a living for themselves and their families.

I noticed in the remarks of the junior Senator from Georgia yesterday his rather severe strictures upon certain immigrants who had been brought into this country and finally landed in the factory cities of Massachusetts or some other part of New England, and then had been confronted with conditions entirely different from those which had been represented to them before they came. They had been buncoed, as I presume they realized, and they resented the country and its representatives, became a menace, made trouble, and we had a riot and quite an industrial war in consequence.

Away back, early in history, before we had handed to us the Ten Commandments, in the days of Rameses the Great, the mouthpiece of the Almighty, Moses, who was a Jew born and living in Egypt, resented the unbearable conditions which were visited on his people, the people some of whose interests are at stake even in this bill to-day. When he found an Egyptian boss abusing another Jew he slew him. He was the first striker on record who used violence. Striking workmen have not gone further to-day. The contest has been going on from the earliest days of mankind; and this country itself, with all its boasted liberty, which has been appealed to so eloquently here, and the fear expressed that we were about to depart from our ancient glory, has always fattened itself upon every bit of cheap labor that could be brought in and rode upon its back free if it could do so. I think the time has come when we ought to take proper safeguards in the interest of the people here, without undue injustice or undue discrimination against the people of any other country; but we first owe a duty to our own people, and believing that they are not getting what they should get under the present law, I am going to vote against this amendment.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I regret very much that my distinguished friend from Oregon [Mr. LANE] can not stand with me on this matter. However, I am thoroughly satisfied that he is prompted by conscientious motives, as are many of the Senators on the other side.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All of them.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, all of them, including the men from the South, probably for a reason which I do not choose to tell but which in my mind I think I know. I am satisfied there is a preconcerted effort on the part of certain great organizations to flood the Senate and Senators with arguments against this proposal. I am willing to believe that they, too, are conscientious.

I have received hundreds of circulars from various organizations, such as the Junior Order of American Mechanics, who are a splendid lot of men; the Sons of Washington, who are patriotic Americans; and a myriad of others, urging that I vote for a literacy test; and yet, from my knowledge of these men and the societies, 90 per cent—yes, I believe nearly 99 per cent—of them came from parents who landed in this country from foreign shores and were in the major part unable to read or write. I answered them, and I answer Senators here to-day, that I am willing to believe you are probably as charitable in your views as I am myself; I believe you are prompted by patriotic motives; but I say you are pursuing a most mistaken, dangerous, un-American, uncharitable, and un-Christian policy. Even though I may be the only one to vote for this amendment, I shall stand here and vote "yea" with all the earnestness of my nature.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I will say but a few words in reply to my distinguished friend from New Jersey, whom I very highly regard, and for whose motives I always entertain the highest degree of respect. He always votes as he honestly believes he ought to vote, and I respect him; but the conditions which existed here in the early days, when the country was new, when its resources were untouched, when there were boundless plains and prairies and millions upon millions of acres of timberland and wheat land for people to go upon and make a living, were vastly different from the conditions prevailing to-day, when the great natural resources of the country have gone, in the majority of instances, into the hands of a few. Now labor is being imported from all over the world, wherever it can be reached or the law permits, to be brought into this country. It is being brought in by insidious methods and by false promises, and immigrant laborers are pitted one against the other to bring down the standard of living to the American citizen to the lowest possible notch. That is what I am voting against.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator who has just concluded his remarks to the fact that this amendment which is now proposed does not at all affect the question of contract labor or of the methods that have been employed in the past to bring labor into this country through advertisements and inducements.

I think there is not a man in the Senate who is not opposed to contract labor. That is already prohibited by law; and this bill strengthens that law, and to that extent I am heartily in accord with the bill. Moreover, this bill makes it a crime to send out advertisements and to do the things to which the Senator has referred. That is all prohibited in other clauses of the bill; and if the bill is passed without the literacy test, nevertheless the law will then prohibit all advertisements, all inducements, all contracts, and all of those evil methods which have heretofore been employed and which have resulted in bringing large numbers of people here to be really victimized. So that that question is taken care of in another part of the bill.

Now, Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read an address upon this bill which is of an exceedingly illuminating character which was made by an eminent lawyer of New York, Mr. Marshall, and which I think contains much that is worthy of consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long is it?

Mr. REED. It is not very long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the address can be printed as well, I object.

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. President, I will ask to have the address returned to me.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire what the date of the letter is.

Mr. REED. It is not a letter. It is an address that was delivered only a few weeks ago.

Mr. THOMAS. The purpose of my inquiry was to ascertain whether it was not a letter which I had already offered, and which is now in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. No; it is not a letter. Of course, if the Senator objects to its being read from the desk, I can read it. I am a pretty good reader.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate order the reading of the address by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule the motion is in order. The question is, Shall the paper be read?

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the address.

The Secretary proceeded to read the paper, and having read for some time,

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who requested the reading of this document, a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is not in the Chamber.

Mr. BRYAN. He is not present, but the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], I have no doubt, can answer the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has consented to the reading of the paper, and the Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the paper, and was interrupted by Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the paper be dispensed with.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection, and the Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary continued the reading of the paper.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Oliver	Smoot
Borah	James	Overman	Sterling
Brandegee	Jones	Page	Sutherland
Bryan	Kern	Perkins	Swanson
Burton	La Follette	Poindexter	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lane	Ransdell	Thornton
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Reed	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Root	Walsh
Culberson	Lippitt	Shafroth	White
Dillingham	Lodge	Sheppard	Williams
Fletcher	McCumber	Simmons	Works
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Gronna	Myers	Smith, Md.
Hardwick	Norris	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the paper.

Mr. REED. I am informed that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] desires to proceed with the address which he gave notice he would make this morning. I therefore ask that the reading of the paper be discontinued and that the part of it not read be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDWICK. In behalf of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and in his absence I am compelled to object.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from South Carolina asked me to object to any request for unanimous consent while this matter is pending.

Mr. REED. This does not displace the bill. I move that the further reading of the address of Mr. Marshall be discontinued and that the entire address be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The paper entire is as follows:

ADDRESS OF LOUIS MARSHALL BEFORE THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY FORUM FEBRUARY 20, 1914, IN ANSWER TO AN ARGUMENT BEFORE THE SAME FORUM BY SENATOR DILLINGHAM.

Mr. MARSHALL. Prof. Jenks, ladies, and gentlemen, I regret to begin with the apology that I have not had an opportunity to arrange my thoughts in an orderly manner, so as to enable me to present them in a form least disadvantageous to the cause which I am called to advocate. I shall, however, seek, while expressing my views with all fairness, to indicate that there is decidedly another side to the question from that which Senator DILLINGHAM championed here last week. I have the highest regard and respect for him. I know that, as one of the Immigration Commission of which Prof. Jenks was likewise a member, he gave to the subject of immigration the most painstaking study and that the work of that commission was stupendous. The material gathered by it fills 40 huge volumes. I do not pretend to have read them. I have even heard it intimated that the members of the commission have not read them. It is quite possible that Prof. Jenks, with his characteristic industry, has read a substantial part of them. It is certain, however, that if anybody has attempted to read them all, his mind must be in such a state of confusion as to preclude him from possessing a lucid appreciation of their contents. Several commentaries have already been written upon them, one by Prof. Jenks with Mr. Lauck, and another by Dr. Isaac A. Hourwich. Although they agree in some respects they are diametrically opposed in their views as to many of the fundamental propositions which it was expected that this great mass of material would elucidate.

After gathering voluminous statistics the commission was obliged, without adequate opportunity for digesting them, to bring its work to a sudden close and to reach a conclusion in an exceedingly brief period after it had collated the material. It was said by one of the commissioners who filed a dissenting report that he did not even have an opportunity to prepare his report in such form as he desired, because of the short time allotted for that purpose. I do not make these statements by way of criticism, but merely in explanation, and for the purpose of showing how minds fair and free from bias may, starting with the same data, arrive at conclusions which seem to be entirely at war with each other.

The conclusion which the Immigration Commission urged, after making this study, was that there should be such a selection from among the immigrants to this country as would eliminate the undesirables. So far as that conclusion is concerned, there can be no two views. We are all opposed to the admission into this country of those who are undesirable. Our immigration laws now in force, and which have been carefully framed, contain adequate provisions for the exclusion of undesirables. There is no doubt that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to enact a law which will exclude immigrants altogether, not only those who come in the steerage, but also those who sail in the first and second cabins of an ocean liner. There is no doubt but that it is within the competency of Congress to build a Chinese wall around our country, to make of us an isolated and parochial people, in the narrowest sense of the term. Thus far, however, there has been no general tendency manifest in favor of the enactment of exclusion laws, except in the case of the Chinese. Even now there is no direct attempt to bring about the total exclusion of immigrants. There is no doubt that Congress possesses plenary power to regulate immigration in any way that it sees fit and to provide safeguards against the admission of those whose presence here would be injurious to the country. It is on that theory that our present laws exclude those who are apt to become public charges, those who are of bad character, immoral, or of criminal antecedents, those who are insane, those who are physically unfit, those who are opposed to organized government. It is now sought to amend the immigration law so as to exclude militant suffragists. As to whether or not such an amendment is necessary, I express no opinion.

We now reach a point in the process of our national legislation when it is sought to exclude another large class of intending immigrants—those who are illiterate; those who are unable to read in some language or dialect the mystical 25 words which may be submitted for their confusion by the inspector who meets them at Ellis Island or at any of the other of our ports of entry. If they are unable to satisfy the critical ear or the discriminating judgment of the philological inspector, they will be compelled to return whence they came; they are deported from what were once hospitable shores, and the gate of opportunity is slammed in their very faces. However honest, industrious, and worthy they may be, they are transformed into undesirables, and their feet must not touch the soil of the land of the free and the home of the brave.

There has just been passed in the House of Representatives what is known as House bill No. 6060, introduced by Congressman BURNETT, of Alabama, a State where but few immigrants have settled. It is intended by this bill to regulate generally the subject of immigration. It is important, for our present consideration, only from the fact that it adopts literacy as the supreme test to determine the desirability of an immigrant. Hence it becomes important to consider whether or not it is right, just, and proper, and in accordance with the best traditions of our Government or consonant with the welfare of our people and of humanity that such a piece of legislation shall be permitted to find a place upon our statute book. This is not the first attempt in that direction. In 1897 a similar restrictive measure was passed by Congress, and President Cleveland, in the last days of his second term, on March 2, 1897, vetoed that bill, because he was opposed to it in principle, and because he deemed it contrary to the noble concepts upon which our Government was founded, one of which was to afford an asylum to all law-abiding men and women who choose to come here to take up their abode, desirous of observing our laws, and eager to become useful members of society. That was the last heard of such legislation until 1906, when it was again agitated. On that occasion the bill which contemplated a literacy test was amended so as to provide for the appointment of the Immigration Commission to which I have already referred, for the purpose of investigating the entire subject in all of its numerous phases. Nothing further was done in relation to such legislation until after the Immigration Commission had reported and had recommended as one of the possible methods of regulating immigration the adoption of a literacy test. Accordingly there was introduced in both Houses of Congress in 1912 what is known as the Dillingham-Burnett bill, which advocated the literacy test, formulated in practically the same terms as those employed in the bill which had been vetoed by President Cleveland in 1897. That bill passed both Houses and came before President Taft, likewise in the last days of his term, so that one of his last official acts was the consideration of this proposed law. After careful examination and study, after hearing elaborate arguments pro and con, he vetoed the bill upon practically the same grounds as those which had been urged against the same measure by President Cleveland, basing his message largely upon a report made to him by Secretary Nagel, then at the head of the Department of Commerce and Labor, himself an immigrant and the son of an immigrant, who demonstrated the fallacy of the contemplated legislation. The bill was then again voted upon in Congress and the President's veto was sustained. Now we are in the early days of a new administration. Again we are confronted by this same specter, and it would seem as though the time had come when it should effectually be laid away and a finality reached with respect to this kind of legislation. It must either be adopted and become a component part of our governmental machinery, a principle in our national life, or it should be so frowned upon that it will not again appear as a cause of vexation and as a menace to the humanitarian ideals which have made of us the great moral influence of the world. No good portent to the country can be seen in the constant agitation of a subject which involves racial distinctions and which tends to arouse the evil spirits of selfishness and intolerance.

What are the arguments that are adduced in favor of the literacy test? The burden of proof certainly rests upon those who ask for the adoption of such a test to establish its necessity. It is not for those who are opposed to it to show cause why it should not be adopted. Our whole past history indicates that up to the present time we have favored and encouraged immigration. The Declaration of Independence gave as one of the grievances of the American Colonies against the English Government that the latter was seeking to prevent immigration into the Colonies. After we became independent the immigrant was invited here, was encouraged to come, and so he has been encouraged ever since. We were but a handful of people at the beginning of the nineteenth century. We had a country which needed development and which could not get along without immigrants. In fact all the people who resided in the original States were either immigrants or the children of immigrants not many generations removed. And that has been the story of our country from that time to this.

Take this audience. I have never seen it before to-day, but I venture to assert that a large proportion of those present are immigrants or the sons or daughters of immigrants, and that we will not be required to go back more than one or two generations to find that the ancestors of the representative Americans whom I am now addressing came hither from some European country. What is illustrated by those here assembled can be duplicated in almost every one of our great cities among those in every walk of life—yes, even in the Halls of Congress. We are a cosmopolitan Nation and have absorbed the best of the pioneer spirit that the brave men and noble women who came here from abroad brought with them. Our country has certainly not suffered in consequence of the adoption of a liberal immigration policy. Are we materially, morally, and intellectually worse off than we would have been if we had confined the privileges of this blessed country to those who were here at the end of the Revolutionary War and to their descendants? Would this country be more prosperous if its inhabitants consisted merely of the sons and daughters of the Revolution? I think you will agree with me that we would not in that contingency have materially progressed to where we are to-day. Our country would not have been developed as it has been. There would not have been that hum of the wheels of industry in our cities; our railroads would not have stretched from sea to sea; the farms of the Middle West would not have been cultivated; the mines in the Rocky Mountains would not have been opened; the coal and the iron in our various States would not have been developed; our population would be not one-third—no, not one-fourth—of what it is to-day; and we would not have become the world power, the intellectual, the civilizing influence that we now are, if the immigrant had not been freely admitted as a part of our population. It seems unnecessary to discuss this phase of the subject with any degree of detail; the statistics gathered by the Immigration Commission render further proof useless. The facts are so apparent to one and all of us that it is axiomatic that whatever we have accomplished materially in this country has only been rendered possible by the influx of immigration.

Now, how is it in civics? Has this country deteriorated on account of the immigrant? Have we a diminished sense of public obligation? Did the immigrant during the Civil War stay at home? Did he deny himself to the country of his adoption even before he had become a citizen? I remember that when I was a child, in the city of Syracuse, the One hundred and forty-ninth Regiment of New York Volunteers was enlisted, and Company A consisted entirely of immigrants. They fought for their new country with as much zest as they could had they been born here and had their ancestors for generations before been born here. In fact, those who have had occasion to study the immigrant find that he is apt to become Chauvinistic in his devotion to the country. They are often more Bourbon than the Bourbons, more royalist than the king. They are much more demonstrative in their attachment for the country and its institutions than are the sons and daughters of those whose ancestors came at an early day.

When you come to consider the manner in which the right of suffrage is exercised by them you will find that, in proportion, fewer naturalized citizens neglect the duties of citizenship than native-born citizens. This is especially observed in some of our older communities where immigrants are not encouraged and where a comparatively small portion of the voters actually exercise the elective franchise. I also assert that you will find less corruption among the voters who have recently migrated to this country, who are naturalized citizens, than you will in some of the homogeneous communities where practically all of the citizens are native born. I have only to call your attention to the recent disclosures in Adams County, Ohio, where practically no immigrants reside, where there are few if any naturalized citizens, and where, nevertheless, nearly two-thirds of the native-born voters were disfranchised by judicial decision because they habitually sold their votes at elections. The same phenomena have been observed in Pennsylvania and in other regions where immigrants are not welcome. The reason why these immigrants are faithful to the sacred trust of citizenship is that they know what it is to be free, what it is to live in a land of liberty. They appreciate that great gift of freedom which is vouchsafed to them when they are permitted to land here and to become citizens. On the other hand, many of the elder inhabitants, of the elder generations, do not evince that zeal, that enthusiasm, that zest in the exercise of the freeman's franchise as do those who know from bitter experience what it is not to possess those privileges, and what it means to be oppressed and to be trodden under the foot of despotism.

But it is suggested by our opponents that they are not seeking to keep out intelligent immigrants—men who possess all these fine qualities. They say: "We admit that if everybody who came to this country were a Carl Schurz, or men of his type, then, of course, each of them would be a great asset; but the average man is not like Carl Schurz. He does not possess these ideal qualities. He is apt to be ignorant; he is illiterate; he is undesirable." Well, now, this argument of undesirableness is an old one. If you will read the records of Congress from 1820 on you will find that almost every class and every generation of immigrants to the United States was by some considered undesirable. If you refer to Niles' Register for 1821, and other similar publications, which I had the honor of presenting to a congressional committee several years ago, you will find a rather amusing collation of material illustrative of the idea that all who came years ago were desirable and all who come now are undesirable. It is there declared with much vehemence that the Irish is an undesirable immigrant, for he possesses this bad quality and that bad quality; that the German is undesirable, for he is clannish and does not assimilate; that the French Canadian is objectionable, for reasons best known to the objectors. When the Scandinavians came there were those who objected to them because they had the defects of their qualities. And so, as each of the several strains of nationality came to this country, the native American—I do not mean the Indian—and those of other nationalities which had preceded them indulged in criticism of them, and to-day you find that those nationalities which were criticized in 1821 and 1848, and 1860 and 1880, are now considered the salt of the earth. To-day, those whose advent to this country in 1855, and for some years thereafter, created the "Know-nothing" movement, are considered to be the desirable citizens. Their children of Irish, German, and Scandinavian extraction are among the leaders of the Nation, our captains of industry, the framers of our laws. Hence, these, the elder immigrants, are now termed the desirables, while those who now arrive are the undesirable. The former are desirable, because, it is said, very few of them come over here at the present time; the latter are undesirable because they are now coming in considerable numbers. The Irish, the Germans, and the Scandinavians and their children who have been received are often heard to say that the Italians, the Slovenians, the Hungarians, and the Russian Jews are undesirable, probably because they speak another tongue, or when they first arrive are arrayed in different garb; or because they come from a different quarter of the world and pray and think and make love in a different language. All this talk about race difference means nothing to me. The real test is that of manhood and womanhood, that of character, that of industry. I do not think it makes a bit of difference as to his desirability whether a man was born in Russia, in Italy, Scandinavia, Scotland, Ireland, or Germany. From whatever land derived men are essentially alike. In 30 years from now we will not be able to distinguish the children of the people of these six different nationalities from those of the descendants of those who fought in the Revolution. Their children will have become an integral part of the American people.

Why, the other day in his report the Director of Education, Mr. Claxton, said that the least illiteracy is to be found in this country among the children of immigrants. Those who have occasion to examine the records of the public schools of the city of New York are witnesses to the same fact. If you read the lists of the prize winners in our public schools among those who stand at the head of their classes you will find Russian, Italian, Hungarian, and Bohemian names. They are children of the immigrant. They have a desire to learn, a thirst for knowledge which is extraordinary, and which is largely due to the fact that their parents admonished them to study, to take advantage of the education which they can acquire in this country, who therefore regard it as a religious duty to see to it that their children are educated and that the latter make amends for the illiteracy of their parents. How different are the poor whites in some of the Southern States who protest against the introduction of immigrants into this country. Compare their percentage of illiteracy with that of the children of the illiterate immigrant.

But it is said that the illiterate is undesirable, no matter what his children may become. The mere fact that the illiterate is a man of good character, of industry, is regarded as of no moment. He is undesirable; he is not needed in this country; and that is the end of it. Well, now, this inability to read does not affect a man's working power or his capacity to add to the wealth of the Nation or to the public weal. An illiterate Italian or an illiterate Bohemian or Hungarian can work just as well upon our railroads, can dig just as diligently in our subways and tunnels, can build our aqueducts, can perform all of our hard work as effectively as though he were able to read those magical 25 words which are the test of his right to be admitted into this country. These men certainly are more capable of doing work of the character named than a graduate of Oxford or Cambridge, of the Sorbonne, or of Heidelberg, or of any of the great European universities. A classical or scientific education is not required for the performance of severe manual labor. These men do not come to this country to make our laws or to run for Congress or to man our colleges. Our naturalization laws are now framed so that the right of citizenship is withheld from those unable to read and write or to speak the English language. There is a difference between immigration and naturalization. I recognize it. I agree that our laws regarding naturalization should be made so strict as to exclude from the elective franchise those who are ignorant or illiterate. But so far as immigration is concerned, literacy or illiteracy has no material bearing upon desirability.

Does the fact of illiteracy make a man undesirable as a resident? If so, then many of the great families of Virginia should not have been permitted to remain here. An article which appeared a few years ago in Scribner's, or in the Century, disclosed the fact by actual photographic copies of the signatures to deeds conveying lands in Virginia that the grantors, men and women who were the progenitors of some of the F. F. V's., the leading families of the State, were unable to write, because they signed by a mark; and that occurred only within the last century. If illiteracy makes people undesirable, then Abraham Lincoln would not have been in this country, because his father could not read or write; perhaps his mother could, but only with great difficulty. Andrew Johnson, whatever his faults may have been, which time has to some extent softened, could not read or write until he was 18 years of age; and still he became President of the United States. And so there are hundreds of thousands of men who have lived in this country and have achieved considerable success; have developed into important men; have brought up families which have been a source of honor and pride and glory to the land, who were unable to read or write. I know hundreds of men and women—in my early days I came constantly in contact with immigrants—who were of the class known as illiterates, and yet they enjoyed the respect of everybody in the communities in which they lived, because they were industrious; they were thrifty; they were conscientious; they brought up their families in the fear of God; they instructed their children so that they might have the advantages of education which the parents had been unable to acquire; and this experience is repeated in every corner of the land. The Italian who comes to this country as an illiterate sends his children to the public school. He sees to it that they are brought up differently from the way in which he was reared. He tries to make them American as speedily as possible. So far as the Russian Jew is concerned, he needs no encomium at my hands, because he has established his meritoriousness wherever he has had the slightest opportunity and has contributed tremendously to the common welfare.

But it is declared that there must be some kind of a test, and that of illiteracy is as good a test as any. I would say that it is just as bad a test as any. It is as bad to exclude immigrants on one ground as on another. There should be no exclusion that proceeds on an arbitrary basis. If there is to be a policy of exclusion it should proceed upon some rule of reason. Does the fact of illiteracy make a man an undesirable? Is it the fact that the illiterates constitute our criminals? Is it the fact that a man because of his ability to read and write becomes ipso facto desirable? Is it not well established that the most dangerous criminals that infest any country are those who make use of their knowledge of letters to carry out their criminal schemes; men able, sometimes, to speak fluently five or six languages; men well read, thoroughly educated, but nevertheless degenerates, forgers, blackmailers? They are the men who live on their wits, who thrive at the expense of others, who act on the principle that the world owes them a living. They are the parasites; not the illiterates, whose only resource is hard work. I have yet to learn that a man because he is able to read and write is of better character or a better man than he who can not, especially when it is not the fault of the illiterate that he has been deprived of the advantages of education. When he comes from a land which withholds from him these opportunities to seek a home in another, where he may improve his condition, it urges the possession by him of those positive qualities of the pioneer which have converted the wilderness into smiling prosperity.

There is something in his soul which lifts him above the common clay; there dwells in him an ambition which enables him to elevate himself. He has aspirations which point to higher things. He is not content to remain in the slough. He seeks to improve his standards of living and to advance his children in the social sphere through the medium of education. From that very fact he becomes at once a desirable accession to any community, and his children become the leaders of to-morrow.

But it is said that these illiterates do not intend to remain here permanently and are but birds of passage. That does not, however, concern us. We do not ask a man who can read and write how long he intends to remain here. We do not inquire, "Are you a bird of passage?" We have as much right to exclude the literate as the illiterate on the ground that his sojourn here may be temporary only. But suppose an illiterate, after he has worked here diligently and efficiently, should conclude to return to his native land. Is that a reason for the exclusion of others of his class? The tendency of population in the present day is to keep in a state of flux. Communities are no longer unchanging and unchangeable. The world has gotten to be one great family. It no longer consists of a multitude of fragments. Our relations with Europe to-day are much more intimate than those of a resident of New York were with one living in Savannah a century ago. If men come here to do honest work, to be useful members of society, what importance is there in ascertaining whether they are to remain here for a long or a short time or to determine what they are to do in the future?

A number of years ago this subject was discussed before one of the congressional committees, and Judge Bijur, who appeared before it, was asked: "Is it not the fact that a great many of these immigrants come here, work on the subways, aqueducts, and railroads, and after they have saved a sufficient sum of money return to Europe and remain there?" "Yes," replied Judge Bijur; "I have no doubt that is the case; but it is also the fact that the subways remain, the aqueducts remain, and the railroads remain here." These immigrants have come, they have worked faithfully, they have given something for what they have received, and they have as much right to use their money as they please and to spend it wherever they please in supporting themselves and their families as others have to spend their patrimony in riotous living or in paying for groceries or provisions or clothing or for a box at the opera.

I have said that some of the immigrants return to the countries whence they came, but the great mass of them come here to live; come with their families; come to establish homes, to become part and parcel of our population. That is true especially of those who are forced to seek a refuge here, who come here to avail themselves of the right of asylum and to receive that protection which hitherto has always been accorded by our country to political and religious refugees. Are we now to abandon that enlightened policy which has welcomed the oppressed of other lands? Are we now to forget that proud tradition, and say to the unfortunates who are practically driven from their own homes by the denial of the right of conscience, "Although this is the land of liberty and of freedom, you will not be suffered to enter our gates, even though you are a refugee from political and religious persecution, because, forsooth, in consequence of the oppressive laws and the discriminatory legislation to which you have been subjected in the land of your nativity you were not permitted to learn to read and to write"? That is precisely what the pending bill threatens to do, although the iron hand is clothed with a velvet glove. It is declared in the bill that those who come here "solely" to escape from religious persecution are not to be subjected to the prohibition of the act. "Solely!" If a rich immigrant arrives, he might conscientiously say that he comes solely to escape religious and political persecution, because being possessed of adequate means it would not be necessary for him to work for a living. But the poor man, the immigrant of moderate means, who is driven to seek asylum here by the most vile and most oppressive persecution disclosed in the history of the world, as in the case of the Russian and the Roumanian Jew, the Protestant Finns and the Catholic Poles, can not conscientiously say that he comes here "solely" because of persecution. He can not say that he will not seek employment or engage in business, for that would not be the truth. He expects to work. He expects to lead a life of usefulness, and not one of idleness. But if he tells the truth and admits his purpose, if this bill is enacted, he will be told, "You are not here 'solely,' because you are seeking refuge from political and religious persecution. We are sorry for you, but you can not be admitted." Even the victim of the infamous blood libel would not be admitted were he an illiterate. However strongly this argument has been presented to the fathers of this legislation they remain obdurate and insist upon retaining this shibboleth, the word "solely." Thus they are merely holding out the word of promise to the ear, to break it in the fulfillment. They indulge in fine words which bring no advantage to those whom they pretend to favor. They recognize the moral right of the victims of persecution to knock at our gates and to expect a hearty welcome, but in spite of that fact they so frame their invitation as to exclude them from the very benefits to which their right is conceded.

Then, again, what is meant by "persecution"? The framers of the bill have been asked to define that term. To the ordinary mind, which may include that of an immigration officer, persecution implies the exercise of force and violence, the application of the thumbscrew, or of some other form of torture. It bears the connotation of a St. Bartholomew's night, of the Spanish inquisition, or of a Russian pogrom. But there are forms of persecution which are infinitely worse than these, more subtle and more effective—the slow but continuous operation of repressive, oppressive, and discriminatory laws and regulations is infinitely worse and more destructive in its consequences than sudden and momentary physical violence. It is insidious and lasting in its injuries; it works day and night, year in and year out; it is a constant horror sleeping and waking; it is a vexation of mind and spirit; it undermines the powers of resistance, destroys hope, and brings despair to the soul. Yet when the projectors of this legislation are asked to define this word as including persecution, whether accomplished through overt acts or by discriminatory laws or regulations, they balk at the phrase and obstinately decline to add one word, one syllable, or one letter to the talismanic phraseology which they have adopted. Is not, then, the inference irresistible, that in spite of their fine words they have no other purpose than to keep out of this country all immigrants who happen to be illiterate, irrespective of the reasons which have induced them to come hither? These immigrants certainly have no intention to return to their native land. These victims of oppression, whether it be political or religious, or both, who come from Russia or Roumania have no desire to resume a residence in those stepmotherly lands from which they have fled as from a pestilence. They, at least, have come here to stay, to abide here with their children, to take advantage of the opportunities which have been arbitrarily denied to them, without any fault of theirs, by their oppressors in the lands of their nativity, and they can not possibly return whence they have come. This is a most objectionable feature of the proposed legislation, because it is cruel, harsh, and unjust, and contrary to one of the fundamentals of our national spirit.

The restrictionists further contend that immigration must be diminished because of economic considerations; that however beneficial it may have been 20, 30, 40, or 50 years ago, it no longer is of advantage. It is claimed to be necessary to curtail immigration because of the high cost of living, and because of the desirability of maintaining a high standard of living.

Now, in the first place, the argument is fallacious from an economic standpoint. I care not how voluminous are the statistics that may be gathered, the fact remains that the immigrant is almost without exception usefully employed; he works; he is industrious. He is obliged to work if he wishes to remain here. Under the existing law, if he becomes a charge upon the public, he is almost automatically deported. Consequently, if he fails to work he can not remain, and if he works it is evident that he is needed. "Ah," comes the triumphant reply, "then he takes the bread out of the mouths of our own people, of those who have been here before him. His employment leads to the unemployment of his predecessors." That is also a fallacious statement. The immigrant who comes to this country generally does work that nobody else does or would think of doing. Take the native Americans; take the elder immigrants, and ask them to do the work which the later immigrants are now doing in the blast furnaces of Pennsylvania, on the railroads, on all public works; they certainly would, as a rule, refuse to do it. They have risen in the social scale; they are engaged in doing other work, that of a mechanic, such as calls for special skill or training, work of a different character from that of the common laborer; they are engaged in other employments. Some go into commerce, some into manufactures, some in the skilled trades, and most of them occupy other and different relations to the community than that which they filled when they first came to this country. I had occasion to investigate this proposition in 1909 as chairman of the State commission on immigration. The fact was demonstrated that there was little that the recent immigrant did that interfered with the occupations or activities of the elder immigrant or the native American. The latter did work to which they were adapted, while the immigrant did such as the native-born American or the earlier immigrants would not do. Their tendency is to seek work which is light and easy, which does not require much physical exertion, which calls more for mental adaptability than for muscular effort. That is the reason why our farms are to-day deserted by the sons of the native farmers. They throng to the cities and become bookkeepers, clerks, stenographers, salesmen, or perform other functions which do not involve severe manual labor. It is the immigrant who has to take the place of the man who goes what is sometimes termed higher up, but which, unfortunately, frequently means going lower down. At all events, it is the actual fact, as to which a careful observer can easily convince himself, that the immigrant does that kind of work which has been abandoned, neglected, or given up by others, and which has been treated as beneath them by the native born and by those who constitute the earlier strain of immigration.

Again, our opponents say the immigrant lowers the rate of wages; he does not join the labor unions; he does not unite with other laborers or other workmen in his trade; he is a strike breaker. Now, is that the fact? Those who study the subject will find that it is not, but, on the contrary, that the recent immigrant joins organized labor as quickly as he is admitted into its ranks. In the city of New York you will find that in almost every industry the recent immigrants have formed themselves into trade-unions. There are Hebrew trade-unions, Italian trade-unions, and those of other nationalities. This has been done because existing unions have been slow to accept them into their organizations. They adapt themselves, however, rapidly to prevailing conditions. In fact, they have contributed largely to the standardization of labor. Much commendation has recently been accorded to the so-called protocol by which the notable strike of the cloak makers was settled in 1910, and by means of which that industry has been practically standardized. Having been the mediator who brought about the settlement of that strike, and having had much to do with the framing of that protocol, modesty forbids me to enlarge upon this subject. I merely wish to show that here was an industry in which 70,000 tailors were engaged, who almost to a man and to a woman were recent immigrants. None of them had been in this country as many as 20 years; most of them had been here for less than 10 years, and yet they all united for the purpose of creating a new method for the determination of industrial disputes with their employers, and succeeded in evolving a plan for dealing with labor problems which was up to that time unique and which has since been adopted in many other industries, thus marking the advent of a new era in the relations of em ployer and employed.

I would stop here but for the fact that I wish to say a few words with regard to the novel idea which Senator DILLINGHAM has recently evolved with respect to the restriction of immigration. He has confessed in his argument here that he does not consider the illiteracy test an ideal one; he does not even argue that it is a proper one or one based upon reason. He seems to say with entire frankness: "We are admitting too many immigrants. There should be some way of cutting down the number. Therefore we propose to adopt this for want of a better test; that will at least reduce the number of immigrants of certain nationalities probably to two-thirds of what it is to-day." But he adds, "I have invented another test which, perhaps, is better than the illiteracy test—the percentage test. Let us provide that there shall not be admitted in any year more than what shall be equal to 10 per cent of the number of each of the several nationalities now constituting a part of our population. In other words, if there are 1,000,000 Irishmen in this country we will not hereafter admit more than 100,000 Irishmen in any year; if there are 2,000,000 Germans, we will annually admit 200,000 Germans; if there are 100,000 Russians, we will admit 10,000, and so on."

Nothing could be more arbitrary than such a regulation. Our immigration laws would be based on a mere accident; not on the physical, moral, or intellectual qualities of him or her who now seeks admission, but on the circumstance that others of the same nationality have in the past come in large or small numbers. The rule is not based upon the numbers who may have come from those countries in the preceding year, but upon the numbers that have come in years gone by, whether such immigrants were individually good, bad, or indifferent. Hence those coming from the lands of the elder immigration would unquestionably be admitted, because their precursors have been numerous, and immigration from those sources has in recent years grown smaller, while the immigration from lands whence the largest numbers now come would be greatly decreased. The effect would be that not so many Englishmen or Irishmen or Germans would be coming to this country as would equal the 10 per cent allotment to which they would be entitled. To-day fewer Irishmen come than formerly, because the days of home rule are near. In Germany industrial conditions have improved, and therefore there is less likelihood that migration from Germany will be maintained. The same thing is true of England, and a comparatively small number will come from there. Oh, but these people would be welcome, because they no longer desire to come; but as to those who do—that is another story. Inasmuch as Italian immigration is comparatively new, under this rule the number of Italians who might be annually admitted would be reduced to a very small number, as would those coming from Russia. Hence by means of a mathematical formula, regardless of the welfare of the country and of the behests of justice, right, and equity, presto, the problem is solved. In my judgment it would be ten times more honorable to declare that we will not henceforth receive any immigrant from Italy or from Russia or from Hungary or from any other European country south of a certain latitude than to try to accomplish such a result by this indirect and tortuous method, which savors of unfairness and injustice and which is entirely dependent upon the accidental operation of an arithmetical rule empirically devised. How would it work? When would the dead line of exclusion be reached? When would the guillotine operate, and on whom? Why, a man sells his household goods in Russia or in Hungary. He abandons his home to seek a better and a happier one in America. He buys his tickets and crosses the Atlantic He arrives at Ellis Island, his soul filled with noble emotions and his mind with high resolves. He is in every way fitted to become a citizen of this blessed country. He is strong, in perfect health, vigorous, industrious. When he reaches the commissioner's office the books are opened, and it is found that he is too late or too early. He is politely told: "We are very sorry, but yesterday the percentage limit of those entitled to come from your country was passed. You must return whence you came. If you try again early next year, you may come in time. In the meantime you must either anchor outside of Sandy Hook or do the best you can to find another habitation."

And that is the kind of legislation that is seriously proposed in the Halls of the Congress of this liberty-loving land; of this land where we boast of justice, of fair play, of brotherly love, of humanity, of altruism! Does it not provoke sardonic laughter? The pity of it is that this is the project of one who declares, with entire sincerity, that he admires our immigrants, that he hates persecution and oppression. Yet his panacea would effectively exclude the very men of whom he speaks with sympathy.

Again, how many of a certain class of people can come here? Take the Russian Jews—I speak of them because I have studied their condition with more detail than that of other immigrants, and their fate is nearest to my heart, because I know the absolute necessity of keeping our doors open to this people, whose sufferings have not been equaled in the sad history of that much-suffering nation—60 per cent of all classified Russians come from Poland and are only in small part Jews. The remaining 40 per cent of the Russian immigration is Jewish. On what basis will the percentage limit be calculated? Which of these two classes of Russian immigrants would secure the benefits of it? On which of them would the inexorable rule of exclusion operate? Why, the poor unfortunates who have been driven from pillar to post, who have no choice but that of destruction on the one hand and death on the other, would be required to return, if they may, into that charnel house from which they have sought to emerge in the hope of finding liberty and freedom in this blessed land because our finest traditions have been subordinated to an arithmetical test.

I have not the patience to discuss this phase of the subject further. I do not believe that our lawmakers are so deaf to considerations of right and wrong as to regard such a test with equanimity. Let our laws be so framed and enforced as to keep out criminals, defectives, those who would become a public charge. Let them not, however, despise those forces which have contributed to our national prosperity and which have added to the idealism of our people.

DISCUSSION.

Prof. JENKS. I am sure that you all agree with me in thanking most heartily Mr. Marshall for this most instructive and most inspiring address. You know it is our custom to have questions after the address, and we still have a few minutes that can be spent in that way.

Question. To what extent would the large immigration affect the question of employment?

Answer. It has been demonstrated that unemployment is not at all affected by immigration. There are always certain industries which are seasonal industries, in which there are always at certain times of the year men and women out of employment, but that is not in any way due to the immigrant. It exists in industries in which comparatively few immigrants are employed. It exists largely in industries in which immigrants are principally employed.

It is a fact, which is established by the statistics collated by Prof. Hourwich in his book entitled "Immigration and Labor," from the report of the Immigration Commissioner, and from other official sources, that whenever there occurs in our commercial or economic life business stagnation with resultant unemployment automatically immigration is suspended. Those abroad know instantly whether an opportunity for employment exists in this country. If a state of unemployment prevails, they remain at home. At the same time the safety valve operates in another direction. At times of unemployment a large percentage of recent immigrants return to their former homes. Thus in 1907, for instance, immediately following the panic of that year, the extent of emigration from this country was equal to the immigration into it. There was absolutely a state of equilibrium. There was, therefore, no increase of unemployment in consequence of immigration.

Question. We have a great deal of that cheap labor. Does that affect the employment of machinery—the fact that machines are engaged in digging and that kind of thing it would seem to me we ought to have gotten to a point now where we do not need them?

Answer. But, Madam, the argument has heretofore been urged by the laboring people that the greatest enemy that labor has ever had has been machinery.

Question. They have become enlightened now; they have seen that it is not.

Answer. It is a fact that a so-called labor-saving machine takes the place of quite a number of men previously engaged, and in that way it does affect those immediately engaged in that particular branch of labor to the detriment of labor, so far as the physical work is concerned, until they find other employment.

Question. You say these immigrants do the work that the other people do not do. You do not think that the Russian Jew does that sort of labor, do you?

Answer. But the Russian Jews do perform severe manual labor. To-day they are among the most active factors in the building trades of this country. They are masons; they do the structural ironwork for the large apartment houses; they are plasterers and carpenters; they are painters and paper hangers; they engage in all these and other different industries. The needle industry was created by them very largely. They produce in the city of New York in the cloak and suit making industry alone in one year $250,000,000 worth of product, and they are engaged in all kinds of industrial pursuits. They do not dig to the extent that the Italian and Hun does, because they are able to do a higher class of work.

Question. Have they driven other nationalities out of the cloak trade?

Answer. They have not driven any nationalities out of that trade, for the reason that it is in great measure an industry which they themselves have created. The cloak industry and the skirt industry was practically nonexistent in the city of New York and in other parts of the country until the Russian Jew came and made it what it is, created something where before there was nothing, and, so far as driving anybody out of work is concerned, to-day the Italians are entering into the needle industry to a very large extent.

Question. It is admitted that we have plenty of room in this country, but is there not a danger now that we are facing what we have not faced in the last hundred years—of being unable to assimilate so many that are coming to-day? Haven't we got a problem that we have not had before?

Answer. I do not so conceive it. I think that assimilation is proceeding very rapidly. Perhaps I may be something of a reactionary, but I fear that sometimes it goes on too rapidly. I should like to see the immigrants proceed somewhat more slowly in the process of assimilation. I would like to have them maintain some of the fine ideals and the admirable characteristics which many of them bring to this country and not to lay them aside hastily for the purpose of making more rapid advances materially. I am sure that they are assimilating as rapidly as it is desirable that they should. I speak advisedly, because I have had exceptional opportunities to observe them in that regard, having actively worked among immigrants for many years. I have observed them in the Educational Alliance and other similar institutions, and it is really astounding to realize how rapidly they assimilate. If you ever have the opportunity of observing the salute of the flag by school children who have only been in the country for one or two years and to witness the spirit with which they regard American institutions, you would be convinced that the work of assimilation is proceeding with great strides. It is more easy to assimilate to-day than it was in the earlier days of immigration. When my good father came to this country, in the part of the country where he first came, a foreigner was regarded as a strange manifestation. It was really supposed, especially if he were a Jew, that he ought to have horns. He was believed to be entirely different from other people. These immigrants did not have the opportunity of improving one another that now exists. To-day there are organizations in every community which strive with all their might to aid their brethren to adopt the customs of the land and to become good American citizens.

Question. It is a well-known fact that the average wage in this country is higher than in Europe. Now, in the event of increasing immigration what is to prevent the leveling of the wages between this country and Europe?

Answer. It has not as yet been effected, and there is nothing to indicate that there is any likelihood that there will be such a leveling. The tendency has been to the contrary. In recent years the trend has been toward the increase of wages. Of course it is also true that the cost of living has increased, which, to some extent, would balance the increase in wages; but the wage earner in this country has never gone backward, either as to the extent of his compensation or in his standard or living. His scale of living has improved materially. His housing conditions have improved, and his wages have increased in amount more than in proportion to the increased cost of living. I see no occasion for any fear with regard to the leveling of wages, because in most of the countries from which the immigrant comes there are not industries of the character existing in this country. Hence there can be no reasonable expectation that that leveling process to which you refer will take place. Of course, the whole subject can be easily regulated by a protective tariff based on the difference in wages here and abroad. If there ever was danger of other nations meeting us in the field of competition to such an extent as to endanger the welfare of our employees, Congress would speedily adjust the difference.

Question. Isn't it a fact that the literacy tests would not bar the Russian Jew, as he has had opportunity to learn to read and write Hebrew?

Answer. Unfortunately, that is not the case to-day. There was a time when there was no such being as a Jewish illiterate. Prior to the beginning of the influx of the Russian-Jewish immigration in 1880 I knew of but one Jewish illiterate, and he was wounded on Lookout Mountain fighting for the Union. In Russia, however, to-day conditions are such that the opportunities for education, even to the extent of reading the prayers and the Bible in Hebrew, are no longer what they were. The Jews are not permitted to conduct their schools as they formerly did. The Government interferes with them in every possible way. As a matter of fact, 18 per cent of the Russian-Jewish men who arrive here to-day, and about 30 per cent of the women, are illiterates. I have here a pamphlet written by Mr. Lucien Wolf, the distinguished English journalist, entitled "The Legal Sufferings of the Jews in Russia," being a survey of their present situation, with an appendix of the oppressive laws applicable to them. It has an introduction by the distinguished publicist, Prof. Dicey, of Oxford University, in which he lays stress upon this very fact, and shows that a people which during the Middle Ages was a literate people, when all around them was practically a howling wilderness of ignorance and illiteracy, has to-day as a result of these restrictive laws, reached a state where illiteracy is no longer unknown. It is for this very reason that whatever general rule may be adopted as to the promulgation of an illiteracy test, it would be the acme of injustice to apply it to those whose illiteracy is directly traceable to religious persecution.

JAMES P. CLARKE, a Senator from the State of Arkansas, appeared in his seat.

SHIPMENTS OF COPPER ABROAD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, since the commencement of the present devastating war in Europe shipments of copper from the United States to ports of neutral nations on the Continent, reaching the enormous aggregate of 19,350 tons, have been seized and are for the greater part being held by Great Britain as contraband. At the prevailing prices, which are more or less depressed in consequence of the interruption in trade, arising by reason of hostilities, the merchandise involved in the seizures has a value in excess of $5,500,000. Thirty-one ships have been relieved of their copper freight—4 destined to Holland, 14 to Italy, and 13 to Sweden. Nine thousand three hundred and fifty tons are piled up at Gibraltar. Detailed information will be found in the following table, giving, among other things, the ship affected, the quantity seized in each instance, with the date of seizure, the place at which the cargo is held, and the country to which it was consigned.

I ask that the table be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH. In magnitude no interference with commerce between neutrals of which our annals make mention can compare with that to which the attention of the Senate is now directed. It presents features no less singular, as will be developed in the course of these remarks. That the significance, from an industrial point of view, of this extraordinary interruption of the commerce between nations at peace with all the world may be appreciated, I venture to digress to present some facts touching the production of and trade in copper.

The United States produces more than one-half of all the copper mined, the world production of 1912 amounting to 1,006,635 long tons, of which 554,835 tons came from our mines. Mexico ranks second, with 70,000 tons, and Japan third, with 65,000. From 1892 to 1906, inclusive, the great State which I have the honor in part to represent in this body, held the primacy among the States of the Union in the production of copper. She lost it to Arizona in 1907, regained first place the next year, but was passed again by her younger sister in 1909, since which time Arizona has been producing annually about 30 per cent of our copper, Montana about 25. Though this Nation likewise ranks first in the consumption of copper, our manufactories taking 371,800 tons in 1912, we export 62 per cent of our total output, approximately 346,000 tons going abroad in that year. Next to cotton the most important product in point of value exported from the United States is copper.

Our foreign market is, consequently, vital to the copper industry. Any serious interference with it is immediately reflected in the communities in which the ores are mined and smelted. Any prolonged disturbance in or substantial curtailment of that market must necessarily be attended with business disaster in the affected centers.

Our exports go to nearly every European country. Germany has in recent times been our best customer, that country taking in the 10 months of 1913, ending with October, 259,000,000 pounds. Holland affords the next best market, its ports absorbing 148,000,000 pounds during the same period. Then, in order, come France, taking 128,000,000 pounds; Great Britain, about 111,000,000; and Italy, 35,000,000. As the consumption of Holland does not exceed 1,000 tons annually, it is to be presumed that the greater portion of that customarily unloaded at her ports finds its way, under normal conditions, into the adjacent countries, much of it doubtless going to Germany. It seems likely that quite one-half of all copper exported from the United States within the last half dozen years went to that great industrial nation. The war has closed that market to our producers. Grave as is the situation which confronts us because of its loss, there is no disposition to question the propriety on the part of any belligerent nation to exclude copper from the territory of its enemy if it lawfully can. That loss is endured with such patience as they can command, by the operators and the miners alike. Multitudes of the latter in enforced idleness must make such provision as they can against the rigors of an inhospitable winter climate. No little destitution must follow and great industrial loss.

The exigencies of the war, in which we are in no wise concerned, will necessarily entail hardships and suffering upon the laborers in the copper mines and in industries more or less dependent upon them. It might reasonably be assumed that the Government of the United Kingdom, with which we are happily in amity, would not wantonly add to the detriment which is occasioned by the destruction of the German market, the discomfiture and distress that must ensue from the closing to our trade of the ports of the neutral nations of the Continent.

All the leading producers of copper have been forced to curtail their output to the extent of nearly 50 per cent, as exhibited by the following table, showing the monthly production of the companies listed from January to July, inclusive, 1914, as compared with that of more recent months.

	Anaconda.	Utah.	Nevada Consol.	Chino.	Ray Consol.

As the seizures complained of were made upon the claim that the merchandise involved is contraband of war, a little attention to the legal aspects of the controversy is essential to a proper understanding of our rights in the premises and of the obligation, from the standpoint of international law, of the nation whose dominant position as a sea power enables her thus to interdict peaceful commerce.

A state of war imposes no obligation upon neutral nations to cease trading with the belligerents, nor is it any breach of neutrality on the part of the former to permit their citizens to sell either to the governments at war or to their citizens any commodities, even such as are to be used directly in prosecuting it, like arms and other destructive agencies. However, a belligerent may, without offense against international law, seize upon the high seas articles in transit to the enemy country intended for the use of the forces of the latter in the field or calculated more or less directly to promote its success in the conflict. Articles so subject to seizure are referred to as contraband of war.

Contraband is ranked under two heads—absolute and conditional. Absolute contraband includes those articles which are peculiarly adapted to war, such as arms and ammunition and military and naval equipment. Conditional contraband consists, generally speaking, of articles which are susceptible of use in war as well as for purposes of peace, but which are in course of transport for use in the prosecution of the war.

When absolute contraband is destined to one of the countries at war, whether to the government or to an individual in that country, it is subject to seizure and confiscation by any opposing belligerent. As the use to which it is to be put determines its liability to seizure in the case of conditional contraband, its destination is a controlling factor. If destined to the army or navy or to a place occupied and held by military forces, it is contraband; if not so destined, articles falling within the category of conditional contraband are presumably not intended for warlike uses; as, for example, when bound to an individual or a private concern. If they are not shipped for use in connection with the conduct of the war, they are not subject to confiscation and their seizure is unjustifiable.

As to many articles there would be very general concurrence that they should be regarded as absolute contraband; others could easily be characterized as conditional contraband, and still others would, in honest minds, so remote is their usual use from the activities of war, like cotton, for instance, be classed as neither the one nor the other. But with respect to a multitude of commodities the widest divergence of view may obtain as to which of the three classes may claim them, the neutral nations' interest impelling them to contend for a restricted contraband list, the belligerents, particularly those strong at sea, obviously disposed to extend the category of commodities subject to seizure. A circular issued by our Department of State on the 15th of August last says:

5. What is contraband of war is to be determined by international law and usage, influenced in some degree by the positions assumed by the belligerents. As there is no final tribunal for the definite determination of these international questions, they are not as determinable as questions of domestic law. There are no general treaties amongst the nations of the world determinative of contraband of war. The London convention, 1908-9, though signed by the delegates of the countries at war, of the United States, and of other countries, was not ratified by the signatory Governments, and is valuable only as indicating the disposition of the Governments represented.

Immediately upon the breaking out of the war Great Britain and Germany made announcements as to the articles which they respectively would consider as absolute and as conditional contraband, the lists in each case being substantially identical with those of the Declaration of London, except that the British transferred air craft and accessories from the conditional to the absolute list. Copper was included in neither. That convention, however, expressive of the views of the nations as to what ought to be done should any belligerent desire to enlarge the classes of articles falling within the designation of either absolute or conditional contraband, provided that articles might be added to either list by a declaration, which should be notified.

On the 20th of August an important proclamation was issued by the British Government, which, however, did not affect copper until September 21, when, for the first time, that metal was declared conditional contraband. The proclamation referred to dealt with two features of special interest in this inquiry. In the case of conditional contraband it had always been held that the belligerent making the seizure was required to prove that the goods involved were intended for the use of the enemy's forces. Great Britain had herself stood for this doctrine, and there was no dissent from it. In the course of the Boer War, Lord Salisbury defined the position of the Government of that country, a shipment of American goods drawing from him the following declaration:

Foodstuffs with a hostile destination can be considered contraband of war only if they are supplies for the enemy's forces. It is not sufficient that they are capable of being so used; it must be shown that this was, in fact, their destination at the time of the seizure.

Certain presumptions were indulged, however, in favor of the belligerent nation in making its case. By the Declaration of London the martial destination was to be presumed to exist in the case of goods consigned to enemy authorities, or to a contractor in the enemy country who, as a matter of common knowledge, supplies articles conditionally contraband to the enemy, or to a fortified place belonging to the enemy, or other place serving as a base for the armed forces of the enemy.

The so-called Order in Council of August 20, ultimo, referred to, extended the scope of the presumption to embrace goods "consigned to or for an agent of the enemy State, or to a merchant or other person under the control of the authorities of the enemy State." If this recital is to be given the force which naturally attaches to its language, all distinction between absolute and conditional contraband is wiped out, since every person within an enemy State is under the control of the authority of that State. The presumption thus indulged may, indeed, be rebutted, but in practice the effect is as stated, since the shipper is in no situation to establish that the consignee did not intend to pass the goods along to the armed forces. By another provision of the order mentioned, the "continuous-voyage" rule was asserted, though the Declaration of London gave it no countenance. Article 35 thereof declares that "conditional contraband is not liable to capture except when found on board a vessel bound for territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy, or for the armed forces of the enemy, and when it is not to be discharged in an intervening neutral port." If that rule obtained, conditional contraband of all kinds and in unlimited quantity might be unloaded at Rotterdam or Genoa, though its ultimate destination might be some German city, from which it was to be drawn upon to supply the armies in the field.

The order to which reference has been made declared conditional contraband liable to capture "to whatever port the vessel is bound and at whatever port the cargo is to be discharged." Thereupon ships sailing for neutral ports but carrying articles proclaimed as conditional contraband were subject to be overhauled and relieved of the same upon the claim that they were in fact destined to the enemy's forces.

As will be hereafter shown, our Government is in no position to object to this last-mentioned feature, but it is to be borne in mind that it had at the time it was issued no relevancy to shipments of copper, nor did it have until September 21, when, for the first time, copper was by proclamation declared to be conditional contraband. Thereafter a ship sailing to Bergen, Norway, or to Genoa, Italy, might be stopped and relieved of copper which was shipped with intent that it should or knowledge that it would pass into the hands of the German Government for use in connection with its military operations.

On the 29th of October a further proclamation by the English Government was issued revising the schedules of absolute and conditional contraband, by which it was declared that copper would thereafter be treated as absolute contraband. Thereupon copper destined to Germany or Austria, whether for use by the Government of either in the conduct of the war or for use in the arts of peace, though on a ship sailing to a neutral port, became subject to capture and confiscation.

Whether the Government of Great Britain has the right by its fiat to make copper either absolute or conditional contraband is a subject upon which it is not my purpose to enter. Doubtless our Government has protested or will protest, at least, against any attempt to hamper our trade by making it subject to seizure, though neither the consignor nor the consignee contemplate that it is to be devoted to warlike uses. I shall assume in the course of my remarks that it is contraband. The English prize courts, to which all the seizures made must go for adjudication, will give to it the status assigned to the metal in the royal proclamation, however it may afterwards be regarded in the course of diplomatic negotiations or before an arbitral board upon a claim for damages on account of the confiscation of any particular shipment.

It will be understood that in every case of seizure the prize must be taken to a court of the country making it before which the question of the liability to capture is tried. Provision is ordinarily made for an appeal, and if the owner of the cargo seized is given a fair trial and the cause is determined according to the recognized rules of international law, he may claim no redress through the diplomatic agencies of his own country. But if the trial proceeds upon a theory of the law contrary to that acknowledged by the country to which he owes allegiance, it insists upon redress through the diplomatic channels. In a case in which the seizure is plainly without justification, his country may and should require the immediate release of the property, and in any case may insist upon a speedy hearing before the prize court. Obviously the consideration which a belligerent owes to the citizens of a neutral and friendly nation imposes upon it an obligation to proceed in its prize court with all reasonable dispatch.

Reference was made to the recital of the Order in Council of August 20 to the effect that merchandise should be deemed contraband, either conditional or absolute, as the case might be, if in the one instance it was intended for warlike use by the enemy and was en route to him, or in the other it was destined to the enemy country, transshipment to be made from a neutral State to which the cargo was consigned. The principle which finds expression in that part of the Order was developed during our Civil War, though founded upon rules long prevailing in the English courts. An effective blockade of all southern ports was maintained by the National Government. Fleet ships manned by daring and venturesome navigators were persistently engaged in running the blockade despite the vigilance of the Navy. Some of these were attracted by the profits of a successful voyage, others were in the service of the Government of the Confederate States. It transpired that the insignificant town of Nassau, on the island of New Providence, in the Bahamas, a British dependency, was developing into a great commercial center, and it was scarcely a secret that its mushroom growth was due to the fact that merchandise brought there from England found its way into the war area by means of the blockade runners. This traffic resulted in the seizure of a number of ships flying the British flag and bound, ostensibly, for Nassau, upon the claim that their papers did not show their true destination, which was one of the blockaded ports, or that though they might intend to touch at Nassau, it was designed, at some opportune time to evade the blockading fleet to deliver their cargoes in the war territory, or that if their freight was to be unloaded at all at Nassau, it was not to be disposed of in the market that port afforded or delivered to a bona fide consignee doing business there, but was to be transshipped at some favorable season in violation of the blockade. The district courts of the United States, and afterwards the Supreme Court, held that if the real destination of the shipment was some port of the States in insurrection, it was of no consequence that the ship was on her course from a neutral port to a neutral port, if after arriving at such port, the purpose of those controlling her movements was to proceed past the blockading fleet to any of the closed ports, or even if the purpose was to transship the cargo to another vessel that might more safely or more courageously attempt to pass the barrier. The ship was in such case held subject to seizure and her freight to confiscation.

The principle upon which these cases were decided would justify the capture by a belligerent of a ship carrying contraband between neutral nations, if the real destination of the proscribed merchandise was within the enemy country.

In the cases referred to much of the freight involved was indeed contraband, but as all commerce was under interdict because of the blockade, that fact was important only as it bore upon the question of the real destination of the cargo A more complete understanding of the principle involved will be assured by some slight attention to the character of the freight carried by the offending ships.

In the case of the Dolphin (7 Fed. Cases, 868) a part consisted of 920 rifles and 2,240 cavalry swords described in the bill of lading as "hardware."

The Bermuda (3 Wall., 514) carried tea, coffee, drugs, surgical instruments, shoes, boots, leather, saddlery, lawns with figures of a youth bearing onward the Confederate flag, military decorations, epaulettes, stars for the shoulder straps of officers of rank, many military articles with designs appropriate for use in the Confederate States, cases of cutlery stamped with the names of merchants in Confederate cities, several cases of double-barreled guns stamped as manufactured for a dealer at Charleston, a large amount of munitions of war, five finished Blakely cannon in cases with carriages, six cannon without cases, a thousand shells, several hundred barrels of gunpowder, 72,000 cartridges, 2,500,000 percussion caps, 21 cases of swords, and, in addition, a large quantity of army blankets and other materials.

Touching the cargo of the Springbok (5 Wall., 1), the Supreme Court, in its opinion, said:

> A part of it was specially fitted for use in the rebel military service, and a large part, though not so specially fitted, was yet well adapted to such use. Under the first head we include the 16 dozen swords and the 10 dozen rifle bayonets, and the 45,000 navy buttons, and the 150,000 army buttons; and under the latter the 7 bales of army cloth and the 20 bales of army blankets, and other similar goods.

Inasmuch as it is not my purpose to vindicate the judgments rendered in these cases by our courts, but rather to make clear the principle upon which they proceeded, I refrain from any detailed recital of the many circumstances present in each of the cases resulting in condemnation, leading to the conclusion that a manifest attempt had been made "to introduce contraband goods into the enemy's territory by a breach of blockade."

It was admitted, nay asserted, that if the cargo was destined for Nassau or some other neutral port, there to pass into its general commerce, it was not subject to seizure, even such of it as was contraband. In the case of the Stephen Hart (Blatch. Prize Cases, 387; 3 Wall., 559), bound ostensibly to Cardenas, Cuba, Judge Betts said:

> If she was, in fact, a neutral vessel, and if her cargo, although contraband of war, was being carried from an English port to Cardenas for the general purpose of trade and commerce at Cardenas and for use or sale at Cardenas, without any actual destination of the cargo prior to the time of the capture, to the use and aid of the enemy, then, most certainly, both the vessel and her cargo were free from liability of capture.

The Supreme Court affirmed this doctrine in the case of the Bermuda, supra, saying that—

> Neutrals might "convey in neutral ships from one neutral port to another any goods, whether contraband of war or not, if intended for actual delivery at the port of destination and to become part of the common stock of the country or of the port."

It was asserted by counsel—

> Said the court—
>
> that British merchants had "a perfect right to trade, even in military stores, between their own ports, and to sell at one of them goods of all sorts, even to an enemy of the United States, with knowledge of his intent to employ them in rebel war against the American Government." If—
> by trade between neutral ports is meant real trade, in the course of which goods conveyed from one port to another become incorporated into the mass of goods for sale in the port of destination; and if by sale to the enemies of the United States is meant sale to either belligerent, without partiality to either, we accept the proposition of counsel as correct. But if it is intended to affirm that a neutral ship may take on a contraband cargo, ostensibly for a neutral port, but destined in reality for a belligerent port, either by the same ship or by another, without being liable from the commencement to the end of the voyage to seizure, in order to the confiscation of the cargo, we do not agree to it.

Though the Government of Great Britain acquiesced in the decisions in these cases at the time and the commission appointed under the provisions of the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, gave its adherence to the rule announced in them, the doctrine of "continuous voyage," particularly as it was applied to the case of goods to be transshipped from the neutral port to which the vesssel was bound when seized, has been assailed with unusual vigor on both sides of the Atlantic. The jurists of the Continent with practical unanimity have denounced it, and they refused to give any countenance to it, as shown in the Declaration of London. Our Government is, however, committed to the rule it developed or invoked in our time of trial, and has no disposition to recede from the position then taken to shield any of our citizens from the consequences of a violation of it. It was even made applicable in the case of the Peterhoff (5 Wall., 28), to contraband landed at a neutral port, Matamoras, Mexico, to be transported overland into the belligerent territory. Our citizens have accordingly no just cause of complaint if contraband articles are seized at sea though they may be consigned to a neutral port, if the consignors intend that they shall not, or know, or have good reason to believe, that they will not pass into the general commerce or trade of the country to which they are ostensibly destined, but purpose that they shall or believe that they will be hurried to the country of the enemy of the nation making the capture.

Obviously the power assuming the responsibility for the capture must be prepared to establish that the ultimate destination is the territory of its enemy.

The cases from our own courts dealing with the subject of "continuous voyage" have been dwelt upon at what may seem unnecessary length, because the idea has been encouraged that our Government is now taking an attitude inconsistent with that assumed by it in the Civil War, and out of harmony with the rules our own courts had prescribed touching belligerent rights. How unfounded this claim is will appear as we proceed.

We may now return to inquire about the seizures giving rise to this discussion, with a view to forming some just judgment, in the light of the principles reviewed, as to the conduct of the Government of Great Britain in authorizing or countenancing them.

From such sources as are open to the general public it is learned that the captures were made and the copper held upon the claim—if, indeed, any specific claim at all is made—that it was not for consumption in the countries to which it was consigned, but was destined for Germany and to be used in connection with the prosecution of the war. I say if any claim at all is made in justification of the acts challenged—because about the only explanation vouchsafed to the shippers or which has found its way into the press is that shipments in unusual and extraordinary amounts were being made to the neutral countries of Europe, and particularly to Italy. From this it is left to be inferred that the claim is made that the particular shipments arrested were en route to Germany.

If Italy were not herself a large consumer of copper; if her seaports were not great marts in which copper is sold for consumption in the adjacent countries; if Genoa were Nassau; if Italy, in order that her own manufactories might be supplied, had not voluntarily laid an embargo upon the exportation of copper, the circumstance of heavy importations, so far as it exists, might be significant.

It will appear from detailed information to be laid before the Senate that copper in quantities quite above the average left our ports during the months of October and November for Italy, just as our exports to England have increased during the same period, and primarily for the same reason, namely, that Germany has supplied the markets of Europe with the manufactures of copper and brass. Italy took from Germany in 1912 33,829 quintals of miscellaneous manufactures of copper, bronze, and brass, 56.4 per cent of all the peninsular kingdom imported. Every manufactory in Europe not demoralized by the war is spurred to its utmost capacity to meet the demand occasioned by the isolation of Germany. Congress was forced to impose new taxes in order to meet the deficit due to the decrease in our imports, largely from Germany. Our factories proceeded at once to put themselves in readiness to absorb their share of the business that has heretofore gone to the countries engaged in the present deplorable conflict. The keen business men who handle our export trade in copper became quickly alive to the fact that Italy was an excellent market for their product, quite apart from the necessities of Germany and notwithstanding it could not be reexported without violating the Italian law.

Aside from such as is contained in sulphate of copper, the annual consumption of copper in Italy amounts to 42,900 metric tons; 20,350 tons more are utilized in that compound, the principal ingredient of Bordeaux Mixture, used in spraying the vines to destroy the phylloxera which infests them. That country takes normally about 3,500,000 pounds per month from us. England had been receiving an average of about 11,000,000 per month. Both of these countries took 22,000,000 from us in October, but Italy got practically nothing in August, owing to the demoralization of commerce to the Mediterranean—302,578 pounds to be exact—and only about the usual amount in September, while England took 24,600,000 in August and 16,900,000 in September. During the three months of August, September, and October England took at least 25,000,000 pounds of copper in excess of her normal demands, to which must be added 9,609,600 taken from ships bound for the Netherlands and 4,883,200 pounds more diverted from the stock at Rotterdam, in all approximately 40,000,000 pounds. Italy took less than 19,000,000; much less, indeed. The figures last above given show the amounts which left this country, 6,500,000 pounds of which never passed Gibraltar. It is further to be observed that France got but 2,000,000 pounds in August, as against 17,500,000 in the same month of the preceding year; 2,700,000 in September, 1914, as against 13,400,000 for the same month in 1913; and 5,800,000 in October last as against 10,900,000 in the corresponding month of 1913. France fell short of her normal importation during the three months last mentioned, as compared with the same period of 1913, 37,238,120 pounds. Either the industries using unwrought copper were paralyzed by the war or the peril of entering her ports was so great as to amount to an embargo. The Italian merchants might reasonably expect to drive a thriving business with French customers in view of the impossibility of supplying their needs through dealers in their own country. Switzerland had no way of providing herself except through the Italian markets. Normally her supply came in large part from Germany. Neither Belgium, Germany, nor Austria got any copper from us during the three months in question. The entire wine country was obliged to look to Italy. It will be borne in mind that until the 21st day of September copper was not even conditional contraband and was not declared absolute contraband until the 29th day of October. Intervening those dates copper might have been, without offense, introduced at a German port unless it was intended for Government use in connection with the war, and so might be sent to that country through an Italian gateway or made the subject of traffic in Italian cities for use in the arts of peace in Germany. Indeed, under the doctrine announced in the cases heretofore reviewed, our dealers are at perfect liberty to sell in good faith to Italian merchants even munitions of war, though they may know that the consignees intend to sell them in turn to the German Government. If the sale is bona fide to a neutral, it is of no consequence that he intends to dispose of it to a belligerent. Prior to the present war, at least since international law had a being, this principle has never been questioned by any jurisconsult.

There was, accordingly, abundant reason to regard the Italian market as a most inviting one, even though the chance of selling to German or Austrian buyers for any purpose should not be considered. As the price had fallen to the level of the cost of production—11 cents—the Italian dealer had nothing to lose and everything to gain in buying freely. With the disaster that had come upon them by the destruction of the enormous German and Dutch markets, our operators were eager to sell even at the low price offered to avert, as far as possible, the distress that would come to the families of the miners from a complete shut down. It may even be that each in his eagerness to meet the demands of what seemed an inviting market did not calculate accurately on what his rivals similarly actuated might send. It may be that the shipments were greater than the legitimate market would immediately absorb. Such a condition is not infrequent in trade. But it was impossible for a buyer to lose, though he might not realize as speedily as he expected to.

The bare fact that 22,000,000 pounds of copper were consigned to Italy in the month of October might justify Great Britain in signifying to that country that it would regard it as a friendly act if the exportation of copper to any belligerent nation should be prohibited. It afforded no justification for the indiscriminate seizure of American ships carrying copper to Italian ports.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator to say that Italy, since the outbreak of the war, had prohibited the exportation of contraband of war to Germany.

Mr. WALSH. She has.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And that she had included copper in the list.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is correctly informed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator state that that was done as an act of amity or friendship or at the request of Great Britain?

Mr. WALSH. Of course I have no information about that. I have suggested, a little farther along in my address, that practically all of these neutral nations took that course. It is perfectly obvious that it is to the disadvantage of their own trade and their own business and to the detriment of their own people; but I assume that they reached the conclusion that importations into their countries would be facilitated, perhaps, if they took that precaution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I want to inquire of the Senator whether a parallel would not exist in the United States, and if England at the present time is in any position to insist that the United States should not prohibit the transportation of contraband of war, arms, and ammunition to Great Britain and France?

Mr. WALSH. No country is under any obligation whatever, under the rules of international law, to take any steps, legal or otherwise, to prevent the exportation from its borders of any material, even contraband, conditional or absolute.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I mention this because since I introduced a bill to prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition to any country now at war with any other country with which the United States is at peace, the statement has been made in Great Britain, and cabled to the United States, that such an act by the United States at this time would be construed as an unfriendly act toward Great Britain, and would be construed as a practical breach of neutrality. Now, if such an act by the United States at this time would be a breach of neutrality, would not the same act committed by Italy against Germany have been a breach of neutrality?

Mr. WALSH. I should say, then, that the kingdoms of Italy, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway had all been guilty of a breach of neutrality, because they have all passed decrees or issued proclamations prohibiting the exportation of any contraband; not only such contraband as is referred to in the bill of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, but contraband of any character whatever.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator whether the inhibition which he says Italy has placed upon exportations of copper to Germany applies as well to the dual monarchy, Austria-Hungary?

Mr. WALSH. The prohibition applies to all the belligerent countries.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WALSH. Gladly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In referring to the decrees or orders promulgated by Italy, Norway, Denmark, and several other European countries as to the export or import, perhaps, of contraband, did I understand the Senator to say that they permit or that they prohibit?

Mr. WALSH. They prohibit the exportation.

Considering the plight of her people, Italy did, by royal decree, issued immediately upon the breaking out of the war, prohibit the exportation of copper. This decree applied to a great many articles, but permitted the free transit through that country of imports destined to places beyond its borders. With a view to removing any just ground for apprehension and to relieve the embarrassment under which her consumers were laboring in consequence of the seizures which had taken place, a further decree was issued on November 13, providing in substance that "all goods the exportation of which from Italy is forbidden can not be reshipped abroad or through transshipment once they have arrived at an Italian port or the bill of lading indicates Italy as their destination, declared at the origin, or if it fails to contain any specific destination."

Similar action has been taken by the Governments of Switzerland, the Netherlands, Denmark, and Norway, and recently by Sweden. The embargo in the case of Italy extends even to cereals, and the rigor with which it is being enforced is evidenced by a dispatch appearing in our press of Monday, the 28th, telling of the arrest of a gentleman of some prominence charged with conspiring to export grain to Germany.

The inconclusive, even shadowy, character of the fact that our exports of copper to Italy have increased, the force of the considerations advanced leading to the conclusion that a largely increased demand for copper in that country is to be expected, received some elucidation, if any were necessary, in the course of the debate in Parliament on November 17 last. Some member, under the influence of hysteria, perhaps not uncommon in England, induced by some incidents of the war, called attention to the very great increase in exports of coal from that country to neutral countries, neighbors of Germany, as exhibited by the following table:

Coal.	September, 1913.	September, 1914
Great Britain to Holland	154,000	276,000
Great Britain to Denmark	275,794	405,842
Great Britain to Sweden	394,314	633,546
Great Britain to Norway	174,000	233,754

He advanced the idea that British coal was getting into Germany through these countries, and called attention to the fact that the country represented by the premier was a heavy producer of that commodity. At this distance the debate reads as if the remarks of the right honorable gentleman carried a mild imputation that the prime minister was blind, but, of course, innocently blind, to the fact that his immediate constituents were profiting by a trade through which the enemy of his country was supplying itself with contraband.

It is interesting to note the response made by Mr. Asquith, the prime minister, on behalf of the Government. Setting out with the remark that some of the matters mentioned were "of a very delicate kind," he expressed the opinion that the increase in the exports of coal from Great Britain to Scandinavian countries was not so much due to, and, indeed, was "not due at all," to their "being ultimately destined to Germany as to the fact that these countries were deprived for the time being of the supplies they have been accustomed to receive from the enemy country." In this relation he adverted to the fact that the county of Fife, a part of which he represented, was "a great coal-exporting county," sending out coal "to various parts of the world." One of their main competitors had, he said, been Westphalian coal, and as the export of this had practically ceased it was "not unnatural that Scandinavian countries should resort to us in Fife and other parts of the United Kingdom to make good the supply" which had been cut off. In that way there had, he declared, been a large increase in our export to them," but he doubted very much whether "any substantial part" had been "reexported to Germany."

His people may freely ship coal to Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, though it has been on the list of conditional contraband from the beginning of the war. Copper leaving our shores, even before the proclamation declaring it conditional contraband was issued, is seized and is still detained, after the lapse of 90 days without any effort to obtain an adjudication against it. This unreasonable delay leads naturally to the conclusion that the proceedings are not pressed because the authorities are convinced that no English court will undertake to assert and justify, in the face of the world, a rule of international law upon which a judgment of confiscation can be upheld.

Sir William Scott stands in the front rank among the men whose talents have given brilliancy and glory to the bench in England. In respect to experience in administering and knowledge of the law of prize he, perhaps, surpassed all others. In the case of the Madonna del Burso (4 Rob., 169), a ship that was seized by a revenue cutter in the month of November, 1797, rendering judgment, he said:

> It does not appear that any proceedings were commenced against this ship or the valuable cargo which she contained until the latter end of February, 1798; that is, for the space of above three months. However justifiable the seizure may have been, the first obligation which the seizor has to discharge is that of accounting, why he did not institute proceedings against this vessel and cargo immediately, and unless he can exculpate himself with respect to delay in this matter he is guilty of no inconsiderable breach of his duty. It would be highly injurious to the commerce of other countries and disgraceful to the jurisprudence of our own if any persons, commissioned or noncommissioned, could lay their hands upon valuable foreign ships and cargoes in our harbors, and keep their hands upon them, without bringing such an act to judicial notice in any manner for the space of three or four months. The complaints which such a conduct tolerated by this country would provoke against it from foreign countries are not to be described; and it is not very easy to suggest how the real honor of the country, connected as it is with its justice, could be defended against such complaints.

And then he added that "a belligerent nation which is in the exercise of the rights of war is bound to find tribunals for the regulation of them" in which neutrals have the "right to speedy and unobstructed justice." It was advanced that—> the mass of business under which this court was then laboring so choked up the avenues to justice that the cause, if entertained by the court, could not have been heard for a considerable time.

But this excuse he dismissed with the remark that—

> It is no secret that this court has never thought it a breach of that equal justice which it owes to all suitors to suffer a cause to be interposed that from its magnitude of interests or other circumstance of just weight had a peculiar claim to preaudience.

The mere denial of the plain right to a speedy adjudication by a prize court in the case of the seizures which are the subject of these remarks, expansive and annoying as it is, is not so important here as is the significance it carries touching the attitude and purposes of the English Government with reference to further shipments of like commodities.

Some of the copper seized was purchased by the authorities of the belligerent power making the capture at the current price in the English market, and with reference to that detained the hope is held out that if it is finally released damages will be paid after the war is over. These features are only feebly in mitigation of the wrong. The English market was presumably supplied already with what it could absorb, and the arrival of considerable quantities understood to be likely to go upon the market upon decrees of condemnation or to be appropriated by the Government for its needs could not fail to depress the price. No damages awarded after the war can compensate for an unlawful seizure, and particularly in the case of a series of such seizures. Drafts are ordinarily drawn against the shipments. These, being returned, must be met, to the financial embarrassment of the consignors. But, worse, shipowners refuse to take copper for transport, lest their vessels be overhauled, deflected from their usual route, and detained indefinitely in some English port.

I am informed that the Norwegian-American Line, plying between the ports of Norway and the United States, the stock of which is largely owned in this country, refuses to take any merchandise on the British lists of contraband, preferring to lose the freight rather than run the risk of being ordered into an English harbor.

Underwriters decline to take copper as a risk and war insurance is unobtainable. The act passed at the last session of Congress is unavailable to shippers of copper, the bureau insisting, and perhaps wisely, upon a clause in the policy which practically exonerates the Government should the shipment be seized, even when actually destined to a neutral country and for consumption therein. At least the liability under the policy tendered is involved in so much obscurity because of the ambiguity of the policy that shippers prefer to take the risk themselves. The trade with particular dealers and consumers in the neutral countries which our merchants have severally built up is gone unless their demands can be supplied as they arise.

Those affected by the seizures are entitled, first, to have their property released forthwith or to have an immediate adjudication by the prize court; second, a judgment therein upon the recognized principles of international law; third, a cessation of indiscriminate seizures upon bare suspicion of a proscribed destination.

Harried as it has been, our commerce with the neutral nations of Europe has not developed as it might be expected that it would in consequence of the war. Some recent shipments of copper to Sweden were detained, and upon inquiry the explanation was made that Sweden had not yet laid an embargo upon the exportation of that metal. A new principle is thus introduced into the law of nations, namely, that a belligerent may confiscate goods declared by it as contraband when shipped by a neutral to a neutral that has not prohibited its exportation. But even such a precaution on the part of Italy carried no assurance of exemption and was disregarded.

Sweden was persuaded to the same course, and with additional precautions—to be referred to—shipments went forward. Now news comes that on December 28—Monday last—two ships, the New Sweden and the Soerland, bound for ports of that country, were turned in to English ports and relieved of their copper freight, the former carrying 730 tons and the latter 600, though in each case a certificate went with the shipment from the Swedish minister at Washington reciting that the copper was intended for consumption in Sweden.

Searching for some ground upon which to assign a German destination for shipments ostensibly going to Italian ports, it was deemed sufficient proof that the bills of lading ran to the order of the shipper. The advantage of issuing bills of lading in that form, even when the consignment has been sold, is obvious. The consignee may not be in a position to take the goods on arrival and some other disposition may be made of them if the bill is to the order of the consignor. The practice is an established one in many lines. It is general in the copper trade. As a rule, that metal is, and for many years has been, sold for the producers in the great marts of the world by selling agencies, who dispose of it on commission. They customarily ship to their own order, even when the consignment has already been sold. Finding the pursuit of this time-honored custom afforded a pretext for a seizure, it was discontinued, but the captures went on just the same.

The Ascot, from New York to Genoa, sailed October 10, carrying 300 tons of copper consigned to order, but intended for delivery to Brown, Borari & Co., Baden, Switzerland. It was held at Gibraltar.

The Regina d'Italia, New York to Genoa, sailed October 15, carrying 200 tons of copper consigned to order, but intended for delivery to U. Vedorelli, Milan, Italy. It was held at Gibraltar.

The Palermo, Boston to Genoa, sailed October 20 with 200 tons of copper consigned to order, but intended for Schweitzer Metallwerke, Thonne, Switzerland. It was held at Gibraltar.

The consignors learning that complaint was made because the bills of lading ran "to order" felt they might have freedom by changing it. Accordingly they sent out by the Sif, New York to Gothenberg, October 30, 400 tons of copper, sold and consigned to B. Ursells, Efterfoelger (successors), Stockholm. It was held at Glasgow.

The Sigrun, New York to Malmoe, sailed November 5 with 400 tons of copper, sold and consigned to the same party. It was turned into Newport, England, where it is held.

The Tellus, New York to Genoa, sailed November 17, carrying 200 tons of copper, sold and consigned to U. Vedorelli, Milan. It was seized and is held at Gibraltar.

It would be exhibiting the virtue of candor, at least, if the Government of Great Britain should declare that it is her purpose to starve Germany, so far as copper is concerned, however the neutral nations may fare or the laws of nations may be wrenched, or even defied, in the process.

It may be a matter of supreme unconcern to the military authorities of that country that little children cry for bread in Butte, Mont., or in Bisbee, Ariz., that she accomplish that end; but if she values the good opinion of the people of the United States who, as a whole, are not at all unfriendly to her cause, but who are not equally indifferent to the want her policy imposes here, she will hearken to the kindly admonition of the President and restrain the activities of her navy, so far as our commerce is concerned, within lines that her own great law givers, at least, have laid down.

In the course of negotiations resulting from similar aggressions toward the close of the last century, Jefferson, then Secretary of State, in a letter to Mr. Pinckney, our representative at the English court, said that Great Britain might "feel the desire of starving an enemy nation, but she can have no right of doing it at our loss nor of making us the instrument of it."

Some degree of circumspection might be expected in the exercise of her undoubted rights, some delicacy in asserting them in view of the fact that the course which has been pursued is obviously to the advantage of her fabricators of copper as against those of competing neutral nations. If shipments of copper to Italy and the Scandinavian countries can be shut off or seriously embarrassed, the English market, the only free, untrammeled one to which our surplus can go in any quantity, is continually glutted. The price of raw copper is continually depressed there, while it is unduly expensive in the rival countries. Her manufacturers enjoy a distinct advantage in the purchase of their raw material. Then, the supply on the Continent being precarious, and the possibility of workers in copper and its compounds being able to fill orders promptly, being likewise involved in doubt, the English factories capture the market. The copper trade in England is in a most thriving condition. The assertion is made upon the authority of a circular-printed market report, issued under date of Friday, November 27, 1914, by Henry R. Merton & Co. (Ltd.), of London, dealers in metals, and reputed to be advisers to the Government in respect to purchases of them, from which circular the following is quoted:

> So far as refined copper is concerned, the business done has been good and the tone strong. Manufacturers have been ready buyers, so that dealers have been able to dispose of satisfactory quantities, whilst the principal producers have been much stiffer in their attitude. The present consumption of copper in this country, as well as in France, is evidently on quite a large scale, and, in addition, a good demand is reported for sulphate at higher prices, makers being now well sold ahead.

This roseate view is fully confirmed by the statistics. For some reason the market for sulphate, as reported by Merton, seems to be exceptionally good. While but 374 tons of that commodity were exported from Great Britain in August, and 300 tons in September, 407 tons went out in October and 739 tons in November. Of manufactures of copper, Great Britain exported in August 988 tons, and but 591 in September, but in October the output of the preceding month was nearly doubled, 1,160 tons leaving her shores, and in November 1,191 tons.

Another story comes from Italy: The five largest consumers of copper in that kingdom—Corradini, Naples; Schiapparelli, Turin; Unione, Genoa; Trafilirie and the Metallurgica, Leghorn—have all been embarrassed in their operations, some of them running intermittently, because copper bought by them was impounded at Gibraltar. Unione is the largest producer of copper sulphate in Italy, using annually from 6,000 to 7,000 tons of copper.

The steamer Italia, referred to in the list heretofore given, carried, among other items, 100 tons of Arizona pig copper—bessemerized, a quality suited to the manufacture of sulphate of copper—consigned by the United Metals Selling Co. for the account of Schiapparelli, Turin. It carried also 336,197 pounds consigned by the American Smelting & Refining Co. to their order and sold to the same purchaser. The first-mentioned lot, with two others of like amount, sold to two other Italian manufacturers, was released and forwarded. The other is still held at Gibraltar. The fact may not be without significance that either it chanced that the United Metals Selling Co. sold, or it took the precaution to sell, through English merchants.

Notwithstanding the embargoes generally in force, ships will not take cargoes from American merchants without a certificate from the ambassador or minister of the country to which they are to go, upon cable advice from his home government, reciting that the copper is for neutral consumption. These annoying formalities seem to be unessential in the case of shipments ordered by English houses to be forwarded to neutral ports.

What is needed now is the release of every detained shipment against which a prima facie case of guilt can not be made out, carrying with it an assurance to the trade that so long as it is honest it is safe. The American people will be very patient with respect to the case or cases, so much talked of and written about, of copper bars concealed in cotton bales. The 9,000 tons of copper now at Gibraltar were not concealed in cotton bales. The consignments all showed on the ship's papers, in the regular and usual way, as did one unloaded at Marseille, likewise much advertised as being underneath a cargo of oats. Copper is convenient ballast, and goes regularly to the place where it will best subserve that purpose.

There will be very general satisfaction whenever any dishonest shipper, who resorts to the arts of the smuggler to introduce his wares into the forbidden territory, gets caught in the act. His activities naturally cast suspicion upon honest trade and subject it to more rigid and annoying search than would otherwise perhaps be made. But the practices of those who endeavor to conceal the true nature of their goods that they may surreptitiously find their way into a belligerent country have no bearing upon the question of the detention of wares such as those which are the subject of these remarks, with respect to which there is no claim that there was any effort at concealment. In the case of nearly all the recent seizures the departure of the cargo was made public through the official formalities of which mention has been made. The consignments were forwarded by firms of high standing in this country, as well as abroad, as they were in the case of every seizure listed, and to houses of equally high character in the countries to which they were respectively bound.

So our people will wait with patience the determination of the question as to whether copper can be made by the ipse dixit of any single nation absolute contraband. That question will arise in some case in which the proof establishes that the destination shown by the manifest and bills of lading was simulated, and that in fact it was Germany or Austria, but it does not appear that the prize was for warlike use. The claim that she may make it such is put forth in good faith by Great Britain, and we must await the slow process of law and diplomatic negotiation to try it out.

And so in every case in which a reasonable probability of a proscribed destination appears or a "vehement suspicion" is aroused, though Sir William Scott considered even that insufficient to justify confiscation, there will be no complaint on this side of the water and no commiseration for the shipper who sought to enrich himself by contraband traffic. So far as the determination of the case depends upon disputed questions of fact, his cause will be a private lawsuit in which the public have no particular concern. But it will be the duty of our Government, as I conceive it will be recognized as a duty by every Government among the family of nations outside of Great Britain, when the questions presented by these seizures are being solved, to bend every effort to maintain the integrity of the law governing neutral trade as it has been developed through three centuries of struggle for freedom. A further extension of the list of absolute contraband is announced in a proclamation just issued, as follows:

Ingredients of explosives, including nitric acid, glycerin, acetons, calcium acetate, and all other metallic acetates; sulphur, potassium nitrate, fractions of distillation products of coal tar between benzol and cresol, inclusive; aniline, methylaniline, dimethylaniline, ammonium, perchlorate, sodium perchlorate, sodium chlorate, barium chlorate, calcium nitrate, mercury.

Resinous products. Camphor and turpentine (oil and spirit).

Ferroalloys, including ferrotungsten, ferromolybdenum, ferromanganese, ferrovanadium, ferrochrome.

Tungsten, molybdenum, vanadium, selenium, cobalt, manganese, wolframite, scheelite, molybdenite, manganese ore, zinc ore, lead ore, bauxite.

Alumins and salts of aluminum.

Antimony, together with sulphides and oxides of antimony.

Copper, part wrought, and copper wire.

Submarine sound-signaling apparatus.

Tires for motor vehicles and for cycles, together with articles or materials especially adapted for use in manufacture or repair of tires.

Rubber, including raw waste and reclaimed rubber, and goods made wholly of rubber.

It is scarcely to be doubted that these lists are thus swelled in order to accomplish the economic ruin of Germany rather than because of the fact that the commodities included in them will be used, if imported, in the prosecution of the war.

Neutral rights will be reduced to a very shadow of their former selves if there shall eventually prevail the following rules proclaimed by the order in council of the 29th day of October, 1914, namely:

(i) A neutral vessel, with papers indicating a neutral destination, which, notwithstanding the destination shown on the papers, proceeds to an enemy port, shall be liable to capture and condemnation if she is encountered before the end of her next voyage.

(ii) The destination referred to in article 33 of the said declaration shall (in addition to the presumptions laid down in article 34) be presumed to exist if the goods are consigned to or for an agent of the enemy State.

(iii) Notwithstanding the provisions of article 35 of the said declaration, conditional contraband shall be liable to capture on board a vessel bound for a neutral port if the goods are consigned "to order" or if the ship's papers do not show who is the consignee of the goods or if they show a consignee of the goods in territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy.

(iv) In the cases covered by the preceding paragraph (iii) it shall lie upon the owners of the goods to prove that their destination was innocent.

And to this I beg the earnest attention of this body:

2. Where it is shown to the satisfaction of one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state that the enemy Government is drawing supplies for its armed forces from or through a neutral country, he may direct that in respect of ships bound for a port in that country article 35 of the said declaration shall not apply. Such direction shall be notified in the London Gazette and shall operate until the same is withdrawn. So long as such direction is in force a vessel which is carrying conditional contraband to a port in that country shall not be immune from capture.

The bare fact that goods bound for a neutral port were consigned "to order" makes them subject to seizure, and unless the owner shall come forward and prove to a hostile court that their destination was innocent, they are subject to confiscation.

In the Nassau cases the fact that the bills of lading were made to "order or assigns" was adverted to with a multitude of other facts, all going to establish the simulated character of the voyage. Perhaps no one ever before thought that such a circumstance ought alone to shift the burden of proof. But it will be noted that the same paragraph makes conditional contraband liable to seizure if the consignee is in territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy. This rule obliterates all distinction between absolute and conditional contraband, save that in the case of the latter the owner may exculpate himself by showing a purpose to devote the goods to an innocent use. In practice it is as impossible, under such a rule, to carry on a traffic with a belligerent in conditional contraband as it is in absolute contraband, and it was intended that it should be. But under subdivision 2, above quoted, our commerce in foodstuffs, clothing, fabrics for clothing, including cottons of all kinds, hides, materials for telephones and telegraphs, with any neutral nation, is at the mercy and is now carried on with the gracious permission of any one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state. Let me read it again:

2. Where it is shown to the satisfaction of one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state that the enemy Government is drawing supplies for its armed forces from or through a neutral country, he may direct that in respect of ships bound for a port in that country article 35 of the said declaration shall not apply. Such direction shall be notified in the London Gazette, and shall operate until the same is withdrawn. So long as such direction is in force, a vessel which is carrying conditional contraband to a port in that country shall not be immune from capture.

Senators will understand that cotton as well as foodstuffs have been declared conditional contraband. All meats, all cereals are within that designation. Now, if one of the secretaries of state of the Government of Great Britain should declare that Germany is drawing supplies for its army from Italy every ship leaving our ports for an Italian port with any of those commodities—meat, grain, cotton—is subject to seizure and her cargo to confiscation.

Unless this declaration is a mere fulmination, intended to be held in terrorem over the nations of the earth who have no concern in the present titanic conflict except of infinite compassion for the afflicted peoples involved, it is time they should be awake to its supreme importance. A learned Italian writer, in a contribution to the press, appearing in our journals of Monday, December 28, 1914, breathing a most friendly spirit toward Britain, declared: "Strictly speaking, no foreign vessel can leave a port without England's consent." He asserts that though British naval supremacy has for more than a century ruled the world, "the weight of this rule has not been felt, as England used her power with moderation." On the 12th of September last the good ship Nieuw Amsterdam, of the Holland-American Line, from Rotterdam to New York, was directed by an auxiliary of the English fleet in the Channel to dismantle her wireless. She acquiescently complied. The officers of the Norwegian-American Line received a polite note that the open ocean between Scotland and Iceland was dangerous, on account of mines, and that if they would only send their ships through the Channel (where they could be conveniently searched) the navy would send a pilot that like dangers there might be avoided. They understood and complied, though they took the risk of German mines in those waters, of the location of which, presumably, the English authorities were not well advised.

The neutral nations of the Continent have concluded that, on the whole, it would facilitate the entrance of goods into their ports if they laid an embargo on the exportation of contraband, obviously lest it should get to Germany.

I have not dwelt on the just causes of complaint given to our shippers of foodstuffs and cotton to neutral ports. I know nothing of them in detail, but I do know that there never was a day when shipments of cotton from our shores to any port should have been interrupted, save for the want of vessels in which to carry it, and there is no achievement in any arrangement by which they have been finally permitted to move.

No blockade has ever been declared, and yet it is notorious that such cotton as goes to Germany goes with the permission of England.

The Declaration of London expressly proclaimed what is the common sense of mankind, that cotton should not be declared contraband of war by any nation.

The epigrammatic observation of the Italian author referred to may be mere rhetoric. The British Government might well avoid a course calculated to make it appear as an offensive fact. There is no sentiment of hostility or animosity in the United States toward Great Britain, save in sporadic cases of no consequence, in the sum total of the national disposition. God grant that our relations may always remain friendly. The feeling engendered by the aggressions complained of is akin to the surprise and regret experienced by one who has been cruelly wronged by a friend and who remains confident that a personal explanation and candid conference will wipe out all differences and bring a speedy reparation. It is in this spirit the American people await the result of the well-timed note of the President to our ambassador to St. James.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON). The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, strike out lines 10, 11, and 12 and the word "Provided," in line 13, as follows:

All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am one who believes in the restriction of immigration. I know it is one of the principal objects of this bill to restrict immigration, and yet I regret very much that the method of restriction adopted in the bill seems to be the only one to which we will be permitted to give serious consideration. It seems to me that those who are behind the bill have adopted a method of restriction that is to a great extent obnoxious; at least it seems that way to me.

I dislike very much to restrict immigration by prohibiting immigrants otherwise qualified from entering our ports on the ground of the test provided in the bill or any similar test. The Immigration Commission that for several years gave a great deal of attention and study to this question—and I presume have given us more detailed information of the subject than was ever gathered together before in the history of the world—have suggested various methods by which immigration could be restricted.

I am not going to enter, Mr. President, upon any argument or discussion as to why I am in favor of restricting immigration. That is a question upon which a great deal might be said both ways. For the present, in the few remarks that I shall make, I content myself with the simple statement that, agreeing, as I believe I do, with a very vast majority of the American people and of the Representatives both in this body and in the House, I believe we ought, for our own benefit and the good of posterity to restrict immigration. That that has been the idea of the commission and of Congress I believe there can be no doubt. But the illiteracy test has been adopted, and while it is conceded by those who advocate it that it will often result in great injustice and that it is arbitrary in its nature, yet the results accomplished will be the same as though other methods were adopted. I presume it is true that the results obtained will restrict immigration. That the application of this test will restrict immigration and that it may be the means of keeping out immigrants whom it would be desirable to keep out by any other test I have no doubt. Yet it is grating on my conscience to prevent an immigrant from landing on our shores simply because he can neither read nor write.

The commission, as I said, suggested several methods by which immigration could be restricted. I wish to read them. Beginning on page 47 of volume 1 of the report of the commission, they are as follows:

1. The exclusion of those unable to read or write in some language.
2. The limitation of the number of each race arriving each year to a certain percentage of the average of that race arriving during a given period of years.
3. The exclusion of unskilled laborers unaccompanied by wives or families.
4. The limitation of the number of immigrants arriving annually at any port.
5. The material increase in the amount of money required to be in the possession of the immigrant at the port of arrival.
6. The material increase of the head tax.
7. The levy of the head tax so as to make a marked discrimination in favor of men with families.

Those who have drafted this bill have selected the first method designated by the commission. In my judgment, they ought to have selected the second method, to wit:

The limitation of the number of each race arriving each year to a certain percentage of the average of that race arriving during a given period of years.

While I am not an expert, and have not given nearly as much attention to the subject as others, particularly those who were members of the commission, in conversation with members of the commission who have made this very exhaustive study I am informed that the second method suggested would result, first, in limiting immigration to the same extent as it will be limited by the first suggestion and the one adopted in the bill; and, second, that it would keep out the same class of people, immigrants coming from the same sources, as will be kept out by the illiteracy test.

We have several exceptions in the bill, but there is one in particular of which I want to speak. It is that those who are escaping or attempting to escape from religious persecution, if otherwise qualified under the bill, shall not be excluded on account of the illiteracy test. I voted for each of the several amendments that have been voted on to-day to include in that exception other designated classes of people. To my mind there can be no logical reason given why we should permit a man to land because he is escaping or seeking to escape from religious persecution and yet exclude the man or the woman who is trying to escape from political persecution. It seems to me that to be logical we ought to exclude them both or include them both. For my part I should like to permit both those classes to land.

As I said, I voted for that amendment and the others similar to it that gave the measure a larger scope; but inasmuch as I favor the limitation of immigration and believe in limiting it, and having, as I believe, voted for and resorted to all the methods permitted under parliamentary procedure to bring about the admission of such classes as I believe ought to be exempted from the test and having failed, I can not bring myself to the conclusion that I ought to support the pending amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, because that would, in effect, eliminate, as I understand it, the real object of the bill, which is to restrict immigration.

I felt, Mr. President, that I ought to make this much of an explanation, inasmuch as I voted for the other amendments and intend to vote against this one. I shall vote against taking the test out of the bill, because it seems to be the only thing in the bill that will restrict immigration. I believe it will have the effect of keeping out undesirable people, although I very much dislike to resort to that method to keep them out, and I would not do it if there were any parliamentary or legislative escape from such a course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I announce my general pair as before and its transfer to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted without announcing the transfer of my pair. I make the same announcement that I made on previous votes.

I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. STONE] is necessarily absent from the city, being detained by illness in his family. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] is absent on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. If the Senator from Virginia were present, he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN], who is detained from the city on important business. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce my own pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I inquire if the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Having a pair with that Senator I transfer it to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. NORRIS. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who is unavoidably absent, would vote "nay" if present. He is paired.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to state that if my colleague [Mr. BRADY] were present he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Brandegee	Lewis	McLean	Ransdell
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Martine, N. J.	Reed
La Follette	McCumber	O'Gorman	Walsh

NAYS—47.

Ashurst	Gronna	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hardwick	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Hughes	Page	Smoot
Burton	James	Perkins	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson	Poindexter	Sutherland
Clapp	Jones	Pomerene	Swanson
Crawford	Kern	Robinson	Thomas
Cummins	Lane	Root	Thornton
Dillingham	Lodge	Shafroth	Townsend
Fletcher	Myers	Sheppard	White
Gallinger	Nelson	Simmons	Williams
Gore	Norris	Smith, Ariz.

NOT VOTING—37.

Bankhead	du Pont	Owen	Stone
Brady	Fall	Penrose	Thompson
Bristow	Goff	Pittman	Tillman
Burleigh	Hitchcock	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Camden	Hollis	Sherman	Warren
Catron	Kenyon	Shields	Weeks
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Shively	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Lee, Md.	Smith, Md.
Colt	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.
Culberson	Newlands	Stephenson

So the amendment of Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey was rejected.

Mr. REED. I move to amend the bill by adding, after line 9, on page 8, the following:

All aliens not of the Caucasian race.

If that language is adopted, the bill will read:

That after four months from the approval of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States, the following persons shall also be excluded from admission thereto, to wit:
All aliens not of the Caucasian race.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there has been a great deal said in the Senate about the purpose of this bill. It has been frankly avowed by its sponsors that it is intended as an exclusion bill. They have disavowed any purpose, however, to exclude the peoples of northern Europe, who they declare to be qualified by every test, including the literacy test, for citizenship in the Republic. They undertake to justify the literacy test by claiming that the application of the literacy test will largely exclude certain undesirable races who come from Asia, and a great deal of the sentiment in favor of this bill is engendered by the fact that there have come to our shores in recent years people who belong to races that we all recognize are of an entirely different civilization from ours.

There has been a considerable immigration into the United States very recently of black-skinned people; there has been some considerable immigration of people belonging to the Malaysian races. Those people will never amalgamate themselves into the body of the American population, in my opinion. If this amendment is accepted, I intend to follow it by other amendments, each to be passed upon, of course, upon its own particular merits, directly excluding the inhabitants of all those countries who by civilization and by nature are alien to our civilization and to our system of government. And that, Mr. President, in my judgment, is the way this bill of exclusion ought to be drawn.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the Senator from Missouri considered the effect of his amendment upon treaties heretofore ratified by the Senate with certain foreign nations? Has he taken into consideration, further, the fact whether this would constitute an abrogation of some of the treaties now existing?

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President, I have taken into consideration the fact that we have certain treaties that would necessarily be amended if this provision were written into the bill; but if we have made certain bad treaties we must take the first step if they are ever to be abrogated. If we are now to reverse all of the principles which have been a part of our public policy for a hundred years and in consonance with which those treaties were made; if, instead of opening the doors of this country and making this an asylum for the oppressed of other lands, we are to close the doors and adopt a policy of exclusion, then we ought to adopt that policy bravely and courageously, and we ought to state it to the world, taking the consequences, and modifying our treaties, if necessary, to conform to the new policy.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Suppose those treaties provide that certain notice shall be given before they are either abrogated or amended, would it not be our duty to give that notice before we undertook to abrogate them in this offhand manner?

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I think there are none of them that can not be changed within the four months' period limited in this bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, the point I want to get at is, has the Senator looked into that question to see for what notice those treaties themselves provide?

Mr. REED. Not into all of them. We can cross that bridge when we come to it. If we find on an examination of the treaties that we must give a little longer notice, we can provide it before we are through the discussion of this bill.

Let no one undertake to avoid the responsibility of a vote upon this principle, because there may be six or seven months' more notice necessary to be given than is provided for by the provision of the bill, which is four months—for that much time is allowed—because, if that is the reason, we can very readily extend the period when we come to that clause in the bill. I am very anxious to know whether the sponsors for this bill really mean to go up and face the question of exclusion. I am willing to go with them in the best of faith, for I have believed for many years that there were certain tribes on this earth that ought not to be permitted to come to this country at all. So, Mr. President, I offer this amendment, and upon it I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, upon which he asks for the yeas and nays. Is the call for the yeas and nays sustained?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the Secretary again state the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, after line 9, it is proposed to insert the words:

All aliens not of the Caucasian race.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] I present, and ask leave to have listed as a petition, a letter from a citizen of the State of Washington, including certain newspaper articles, pointing out the agricultural and industrial competition of the Japanese race in the State of Washington. It is pertinent to the amendment which has just been proposed by the Senator from Missouri. While presenting this letter and the articles, which I do not ask to have printed in full——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington desire to have them printed in the RECORD?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not. I simply present the letter as a petition, and say that I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri will be adopted.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, it seems to me that an amendment like this, if it is really to be acted upon by the Senate with any possibility of its receiving a majority vote of this body, ought to receive more consideration before a roll call is had upon it than has been given to it here now. I may be attaching undue importance to the amendment, but, in my opinion, its gravity, should it be seriously considered and acted upon here, its possible consequences, are such that all the rest of the bill would become comparatively insignificant, and so I hope that we are not in a sort of hasty, flippant way going to call the roll upon so important an amendment as this.

Mr. President, I do not know where the little volume came from, but a few days ago I found a book on my desk which contained a symposium of monographs written by leading representatives of the Japanese Empire. I have read all of them. I do not know when I have read in recent years a series of statements that have so profoundly impressed me as did those. Their broad intelligence, and even generous spirit, the insight that the writers of those various monographs have into these very complicated questions, not only from their standpoint and within their environment and provincialism, but also from ours, were a revelation to me, and the broad kindliness, the comprehensive intelligence displayed, the spirit, and the attitude were such that it seems to me we would be meeting it in a very meager way here by a hasty vote upon such a proposal as this. I hope the matter will be seriously considered if there is any possibility of its receiving substantial support.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think before passing on this amendment it would be well to note precisely what is meant by "Caucasian." What races would the amendment exclude? There are some races in Europe, I think, that would not come under the definition of "Caucasian," and I think it is important for us before we adopt an amendment of this sweeping character to know just what class of immigrants would be excluded. Perhaps the Senator from Missouri can enlighten us.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to make a brief statement as chairman of the committee. The committee, under all of the circumstances in perfecting this bill, both in its selective and restrictive features, have gone just as far in accordance with our treaties and in accordance with our customs as they thought it was good policy to go.

I hardly think it would be pertinent at this time, if it would be pertinent at any time, to introduce an amendment of this sort, in view of the terrible conditions that exist in those countries from which a large proportion of our immigration comes, and running, as it does, in direct conflict with treaty stipulations. I do not think that the time of the Senate should be taken up with a complication such as this would give rise to. In view of the fact that the major part of the debate has been to the effect that the bill is too restrictive, it seems strange that it is now proposed by one fell swoop to let in a few on one side and exclude all the poor, suffering, and downtrodden human beings that we have heard so much about on the other.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I call attention to what is said in the dictionary as illustrating what I meant. I was not myself prepared to say offhand what peoples the insertion of the word "Caucasian" would include or exclude; but I note under the heading of "Finns"—and we have a great many Finns in this country, and they are a very excellent immigration—the following definition:

A branch of the Mongolian race, inhabiting northern and eastern Europe, including the Magyars, Bulgarians, Permians, Lapps, and Finlanders.

This amendment would exclude Magyars, who compose the best half of the population of Hungary, and would exclude the Finns and the Bulgarians. Of course it would keep out most of the Mexicans except a few of Spanish blood, including Villa. [Laughter.] That last statement I do not offer as an objection; but I do call attention to these European races, of whom we have many in this country to-day, who for the most part are excellent citizens. We surely do not want to make a sweeping provision of this sort that would exclude them under the technical definition of the dictionary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to say that the dark-skinned races who have migrated to this country are mostly good citizens?

Mr. LODGE. No; I referred to the Finns, to the Magyars, and to the Bulgarians, of whom there are many in this country.

Mr. REED. The Senator says they make good citizens?

Mr. LODGE. That is my impression, from what I have seen of them.

Mr. REED. Now, if they make good citizens, why has this bill so carefully been drawn to exclude foreigners? If those people make good citizens, then, surely, nearly all——

Mr. LODGE. The bill does not exclude them. The Finns, I may say, incidentally, have about the lowest percentage of illiteracy of any people who come here.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Standard Dictionary gives this definition of "Caucasian":

A member of the white division or branch of the human species; one of the anthochroic or melanochroic groups—

I frankly say I do not understand that. I would have to follow it up; but I do understand this language—including nearly all Europeans, both Semitic and Aryan; an Indo-European.

It is proposed to exclude those races who do not belong to that class of human beings known as Caucasian. "Caucasian" includes substantially all of the European races, according to this author.

Mr. LODGE. Nearly all?

Mr. REED. Nearly all.

Mr. LODGE. But it excludes those of whom I have just read from the dictionary.

Mr. REED. I am not in favor of permitting to come into this country to become a part of our citizenship any kind of people except white people. The statement was made here a moment ago in some side remarks that there was an effort being made now to restrict immigration by those who have been opposed to restriction. The statement has been made repeatedly on this floor by those who have opposed the literacy test that they did not regard that as a proper test; that they were in full accord with the thought of excluding undesirables; but that it did not follow because a man could not read and write that he was an undesirable; and the statement has been made repeatedly by some of us, at least, that we were willing absolutely to exclude undesirable races—those people who by habits of thought, by the very character of their civilization, by all the laws of heredity, by disposition, and by education, belong to a class of people who never can in the proper sense of the word become citizens of a Republic.

No one desires to say anything, particularly upon this floor, of a harsh nature regarding the Chinese; yet they were excluded as a race. They were excluded because we believed they were incapable of becoming factors of strength in the American Republic. The reason which is back of the limitation as to the Chinese applies to all of the other races that are not included within the term "Caucasian." I undertake to say that the Finn is of the Caucasian race. He is a white man.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Surely the Bulgarian is.

Mr. REED. The Bulgarian is. The Hungarian is, although there may be a proportion of the population of Hungary that are so nearly of the direct blood of the Huns, who overran that country many centuries ago, that it is possible that part of the population of Hungary might be excluded. This, of course, would include the Japanese.

I say, again, that if there is any difficulty about the treaties I will cooperate in a further amendment postponing the operation of this clause until a sufficient time shall have elapsed under our treaties so that they may be changed in accordance with their terms; but I say now that it is my opinion that this bill as it is now drawn violates the spirit, if not the letter, of many of our treaties.

This tenderness for treaties is not the trouble here to-day, in my judgment. It is because we prefer to do by indirection that which we have not the courage to do by direction. We propose to pass an exclusion bill, but to do it not as an exclusion bill but by means of an educational test.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, without going into the broader merits of this proposal, we may assume that the terms used in the amendment are not safe terms of legal definition.

The amendment affects our relations with many countries, and to legislate in terms of which we have not a clear and definite understanding would be most unfortunate. The ordinary sense of the word "Caucasian" certainly does exclude many persons whom the Senator from Missouri does not intend to exclude. Even if, after mature deliberation, we were of the opinion that the races that would be included in this amendment upon any definition should be excluded, and had satisfied ourselves by clear and definite terms adapted to accomplish that purpose, nevertheless the purpose should be accomplished after having examined the treaty obligations which we have to the many nations that would be affected, and after having adapted our legislation to accomplish our purpose without the violation of obligations or the wounding of feelings or the causing of resentment; not in this way, by a sweeping amendment, couched in indefinite terms, proposed and acted upon within but a very few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I make the same transfer that I have made on previous votes and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to my colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CAMDEN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is not here. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent and paired as has just been announced; but if present, on this question he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—9.

Hardwick	Martine, N. J.	Reed	Thomas
Jones	Poindexter	Smith, Ga.	Vardaman
Lane

NAYS—47.

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to amend the bill by adding, after the ninth line on page 8, the following:

All members of the African or black race.

On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the yeas and nays are granted upon that amendment I wish to say a few words.

When the immigration bill was up in the last Congress I offered an amendment precisely to the intended effect of this one. We are beginning to receive now some very undesirable immigration of the African race from the West Indies. A great many Jamaican negroes have been employed upon the Panama Canal; and after the termination of that work, having become accustomed to American wages, which they received down at Panama, a great many more of them begin to come to the Gulf ports. Florida and Louisiana have already received a considerable proportion of African immigration from the French and English West Indies; that is to say, immigration of West Indians who are wholly or partly Africans in race.

When this bill was up before I gave the statistics and showed how this West Indian negro immigration was increasing from year to year. Now, I am very much in favor of this bill. I am very much in favor of the principle which this bill represents. I am very much in favor of excluding undesirable immigrants from the United States. You have already a law whereby you exclude Chinese. Chinese are as much superior to negroes as can be, almost. You have a gentlemen's agreement with Japan by means of which you exclude Japanese.

A moment ago, when the Senator from Missouri offered his amendment excluding "all not of the Caucasian race," I voted against it, of course, because everybody who knew what the word "Caucasian" meant knew that it did not mean white, or it did not mean excluding undesirable and admitting desirable races. It would have excluded the Finns; it would have excluded the Laplanders; it would have excluded the Magyars, or what we call the Hungarians; it would have excluded a good many other people of European race, and it would have excluded some white people who are in Asia.

But I say now that you can not have free institutions grounded upon anything in the world except a homogeneous race. You can try it all you please, but you simply can not have it. You have got to have a population which is at least potentially assimilable in lawful wedlock. If you do not have a population all elements of which are potentially assimilable in lawful wedlock, then you have in the very midst of the Republic a disintegrating force, undemocratic, unrepublican. You will have your choice, in certain sections of the country overpopulated by these heterogeneous elements, between either sacrificing your civilization to them or sacrificing your democracy to prevent them from sacrificing your civilization.

We already have negroes enough in the South. We do not want any more. I, for one, would be very glad if there were some scheme whereby, without injuring them in any degree, without doing them injustice in any degree, they could go somewhere else, of their own free accord, and to that extent solve this great problem.

Mr. President, there is another thing: The West Indian negro, as a rule, is a man who is accustomed to political and social equality, because the races intermarry in the West Indian Islands; and every West Indian negro who comes to the South comes with that idea in his mind and becomes a source of race conflict and a source of race oppression upon the white man's part, or an invitation and temptation to it, which is as bad for the white man as it is for the negro. The worst thing about having a lot of people together in the same community where one race insists upon its superiority is not the oppression of the inferior, but it is the invitation to tyranny upon the part of the superior. Whether that be the greatest trouble or not, it is at least a trouble equal to the other one.

I thought I would make these few remarks because I intended later on to introduce an amendment which would prohibit the immigration into this country of foreign-born negroes, as you have already prohibited the immigration of Chinese, infinitely superior to Africans, and as you have already, by a gentleman's agreement at any rate, substantially put an end to Japanese immigration.

The Japanese has proven himself, in arts of peace and in arts of war, the equal of the white man; yet we exclude him, and I think we are right in doing it, and I think Japan is right in recognizing our right to do it, because it is not a question of superiority and inferiority; it is a question merely of unassimilability—of racial difference so great that assimilability in wedlock is not to be expected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I sympathize with a good deal that the Senator from Mississippi has said, and I wish to ask him a question. Can the Senator tell us whether or not there are any immigrants of the class he mentions now coming into the country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes. I placed in the RECORD, when this bill was up before, the reports on the subject. This debate takes me by surprise to-day, and I do not remember them, but I placed them in the RECORD. While there is not a very vast multitude of them who have come thus far, they have been increasing very rapidly from a small beginning; and we may expect, after the laborers on the Panama Canal have lost their places, to receive a still larger increase upon the increase than we have had of an increase upon the original immigration.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is one other question I want to ask the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have yielded to the Senator from Utah, and until he is through I can not yield to any other Senator. Then I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not quite concluded. Another question I desired to ask the Senator was whether or not the undesirable immigrants of whom the Senator speaks would not be excluded under the illiteracy test?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A great number of them; a majority of them; I think in most of the islands over half, and in the English islands very nearly half. Again I am sorry that I have not the exact figures.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. Does not the Senator think that in view of the illiteracy test contained in this bill the number of negroes who could be admitted would be negligible?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; not negligible. I think the number of negroes that could be admitted and would be admitted would be very materially decreased by the literacy test.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very materially indeed; over half, I believe.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi declines to yield at present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the others, owing to the peculiar conditions in the South, would be the flame carriers.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi now yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have before me the figures on the African race furnished up to June 30, 1914, the end of the fiscal year, by the Immigration Department for the whole United States, giving as well the number of illiterates that came. The whole number for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, was 8,447; the number of illiterates was 1,805; the percentage of illiteracy was 23.3.

This is what I was attempting to give when the Senator from Utah was interrogating the Senator from Mississippi, in order that we might understand clearly just what is the situation with regard to that matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, having heard those figures, I confess myself somewhat surprised. My own impression was that a majority of the West Indian negroes could not read. It seems from this that only 23 per cent of those of them who came into the United States could not read. That is perhaps owing to the fact that the very best element—I mean by that the intellectually highest element—of the West Indian negroes comes to the United States, rather than the most inferior of them. I know that that percentage of illiteracy does not prevail in the West Indies themselves, where it is higher than 23 per cent.

The Senator will find, if he will go further into those figures, if he has them all before him, that since this immigration started in it has increased; and while the number of those who are coming now is not very large, as I said a moment ago, the increase each semidecade is a considerable percentage.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand from the figures just quoted by the Senator from South Carolina that there were admitted into the United States something over 6,000——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Eight thousand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had not finished—something over 6,000 negroes who would not be excluded under the illiteracy test.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and that would be 77 per cent of the entire African West Indian immigration that came during the year the Senator quoted, whatever that year was.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me just another word before I take my seat, so far as I am concerned I do not want to see the negro problem in this country added to; and for that reason I shall vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am glad to hear that. Twenty-odd years ago, in the House of Representatives, when the people of the Pacific slope came to Congress to stop Chinese immigration into the United States, I said to them: I am going to vote with you. Whenever we have asked your sympathy, you have denied it to us. When we have asked you for bread, you have given us a stone. When we have told you that we were of one blood with you, you have practically denied it by your conduct. You have undertaken to put an inferior race upon an exactly equal footing with us politically. You have done that as far as you could, and you have gone further, and you have sought to put them socially upon an equality with us.

"Now, independently of the question of superiority or inferiority," I then said, "there is a difference, which Lincoln recognized and which every man of sense must recognize, that prevents assimilability in lawful wedlock; and that is the key to this problem. If that does not exist, there can not be homogeneousness of race; there can not be homogeneousness of purpose; there can not be homogeneousness of ideals; and there can not be a common patriotism. There may be a dual patriotism, but it can not be a common one."

I said then: "Notwithstanding the manner in which you have treated us year after year, I do not propose to inflict you with a race problem like that from which my people have unavailingly sought to free themselves." I did not blame them, because they had not put the problem upon us. It was the common crime of a Yankee negro-selling and a southern negro-buying ancestry. I have never contended that the southern negro-buying ancestor was a bit less guilty than the northern negro-selling ancestor; but it was a problem upon which it seemed to me we could appeal to white men of a common ancestry everywhere throughout the United States, and especially to those on the Pacific slope and in the Rocky Mountain States. We of the South could say to them: "We are of the same blood. We are of the same race. We are of the same traditions. We are of the same ideals. We have the same family Government, which no other race knows except ourselves." We are one. Whether we be Italians or French or Germans or English or Scoteh or Irish or Swedes or Norwegians in our white ancestry, we are one; but the minute these other people come in we so-called Americans become two or three or four—whatever it may happen to be. And that is not all. We are not only two or three or four when they come, but we remain two or three or four forever, because no matter how long these unassimilable races are here, we never become one, and can not become one without sacrificing things of great importance, without lowering our very race itself—not its standard, not merely its thought and its civilization, but its blood itself.

I sought to get an amendment almost identically the same upon the last immigration bill, and proposed to offer it at this time later on, and had mentioned it to some of my friends; but the Senator from Missouri has offered it in this shape, and I want to vote for it, although I think it could be better worded.

I say, gentlemen, you can not stand consistently before the American people and tell them that you vote for Chinese exclusion while you vote for African admission, when you know and I know and they know that the Chinaman is of a very superior race to the African.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] calls for the yeas and nays on the pending question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is unavoidably absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], which I transfer to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], and vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as upon the last roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I wish to announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and that if the senior Senator from Michigan were present he would vote "nay" on this proposition.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and in his absence refrain from voting.

I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is necessarily absent and that he is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and withhold my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the negative). I observe that my pair, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], has not voted. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and allow my vote to stand.

I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY].

Mr. LODGE. My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is absent and his pair has been announced. I desire to state that if my colleague were present he would vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the vote is announced I wish to say that I have a standing pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I forgot to make the announcement, but considered myself at liberty to vote in consequence of a telegram which I explained on the last vote. I ask that the announcement I made then may stand for the balance of the day to prevent me from going through with this statement every time.

Mr. OLIVER. In view of the statement just made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], I desire to state that by the transfer of the pair of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] my colleague [Mr. PENROSE] stands paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Ashurst	Johnson	Sheppard	Thornton
Borah	Kern	Simmons	Vardaman
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Smith, Ariz.	White

So Mr. REED's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, while the Senate is wrestling with these problems of immigration I have this comforting news to proclaim to the men who are so opposed to immigration. In the Evening Star of to-day I find the following:

Immigration drops; more aliens quit United States—

Rejoice! Rejoice!

New York shows 45 per cent fewer incoming foreigners in 1914.

There is an array of figures here that I will not read. Then it goes on to say that—

Immigration officials and representatives of the immigrant aid societies explain the falling off in immigration, aside from the war, which is the chief factor, as being due to the curtailing of work in the United States and to an effort on the part of foreign countries to restrict emigration by providing work at home and bettering the condition of their working classes.

So rest your souls in peace and glory in being free from the possibility of immigration, and glorify yourselves to your hearts' taste that you shall have in the near by America for Americans.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer an amendment. After the amendment just adopted, I move to add:

Or Turks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, after line 9, and after the amendment just agreed to, insert the words "or Turks."

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I offer the following amendment, to be added immediately after the amendment just adopted:

All Turks and East Indians.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. It seems to me, Mr. President, upon an important measure of this kind the Senate ought to be willing to permit a roll call. The yeas and nays are not asked for the purpose of any delay. They are asked for the purpose of determining by record the individual opinions of Senators.

I would really like to know, and I think the country would really like to know, whether the Senate as a body or Senators as individuals believe a man of the Caucasian race, born and reared in Europe, who believes in the kind of home life we believe in, who believes in the kind of government, at least very largely, we believe in, should be excluded simply because he can not read and write, and those same Senators yet be unwilling to exclude men of alien races, whose presence in this country has recently produced riot, and whose presence in Canada just north of us has produced great disturbance.

I hope that the Senate will accord a yea-and-nay note upon this question. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. REED. I think I shall have to address the Senate upon this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the request again, if it pleases the Senator.

Mr. REED. I should be glad if the Chair would do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks for the yeas and nays on the amendment proposed by him.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Making the same announcement and transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before as to my general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and its transfer to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I vote "nay." I will let this announcement stand on all subsequent votes.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). Again transferring my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN], I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and therefore refrain from voting.

I also announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] to the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—10.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Martine, N. J.	Vardaman
Borah	Jones	Reed
Chamberlain	Lane	Thomas

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to state that it has been my purpose to offer amendments excluding certain other kindred races, but the Senate has fully expressed its opinion in regard to this matter and I shall not take its time now to do so. I offer the following amendment: On page 5, line 14. I move to strike out the words "admit their belief in the practice of polygamy" and to insert in lieu thereof "believe in, advocate, or practice polygamy."

Mr. President, just a word in explanation. There are two different phraseologies employed in various places in this bill. In one case we find that it requires that the immigrant shall admit his belief in a certain doctrine; in the other case the fact that he does believe in a certain doctrine is all that is required. Let me illustrate what I mean by this exact sentence, which I am now attacking, by the sentence that follows. Going back to the beginning of section 3, it reads:

That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States.

Then follow a large number of classes, the exclusion relating to diseased people, and so forth. Then comes the language:

Persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony.

Then:

Polygamists, or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy.

The next language is:

Anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States.

Any persons who admit that they believe in it and persons who believe in it. I am attacking the same character of language with reference to the polygamists that we apply to the anarchists, and which is applied at various other places in the bill to various other classes.

No man who believes in the practice of polygamy or in any act unlawful under our Government, and who advocates it, ought to be permitted to come into the United States, and the Government ought not to be required to admit him simply because he does not admit his belief. That ought to be a matter of proof as to him, as it is as to anarchists or as to other people who do not intend to obey our laws.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Missouri has called the committee's attention to that. The chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be accepted without objection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I did not quite hear what the Senator from South Carolina said.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I said that, as chairman of the committee, I accept the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not think the chairman of the committee can conclude the matter for the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah is right about that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to say a word about it before the matter is disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I want to state to the Senator from Utah that I have modified my expression, and said that, as chairman of the committee, for the committee, I accept the amendment. As a matter of course, I did not propose——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not certain that the Senator can accept it for the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not in the face of objection by a Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from South Carolina can accept it for himself.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment. I am just as much opposed to polygamy or the practice of polygamy as is the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator here, but I know there are people in this world who theoretically believe in polygamy, but who in this country would not dream of practicing it and who would not dream of advocating it. There have been a large number of people in my own State in former years who not only believed in polygamy, but who practiced it; but that practice has been abandoned, yet I venture to say that there are many people there to-day who, as a merely theoretical proposition, may believe in it, and they are, notwithstanding, very good people. The polygamists of that State who not only believed in it, but who practiced it in former years, outside of that one objectionable thing, were among the best citizens of the country. I do not think that a test of this kind ought to be put into an immigration bill, a test which seeks to probe the conscience of the individual as to a mere abstract belief.

The provision that is in the bill to-day—those "who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy," or who practice it—has been the law for a great many years, and I am not aware that any harm has resulted from the enforcement of the law in the terms in which we find it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply have a word to say. I am not offering this amendment out of any desire in the world to raise a religious question or to hurt the feelings of any person, but if it is right to exclude a man who admits that he believes in polygamy—and that is the language of the bill—then it is not the admission of the belief that constitutes the objection; it is the belief itself; and the possession of such a belief ought not to be determined only by what a man admits to an immigration inspector, but it ought to be determined as is any other question of fact.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, I will call his attention to the fact that the language of the bill is "admit their belief in the practice of polygamy," which is a very different thing from admitting a belief in polygamy. They do not believe in the practice of it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have a great deal of charity in my heart for those people who, because of what I regard as a very false teaching, believe in the practice of polygamy, and who, in accordance with that belief, did practice it in the United States. The Government, however, has acted upon that practice and it is now prohibited within the borders of this land.

The question we are now passing upon is the desirability of immigrants. It has been repeatedly said here that immigrants have no God-given or natural right to land on our shores. You propose to exclude a man who believes in every principle of morals, who has lived an upright life from birth until he arrives at our ports, who comes here with the intention to obey every law of this land, who is sound in body and in mind, simply because through misfortune or for some other cause he was unable to learn to read. Now, I want to say that, applying those rules, people who believe in or who practice that which is prohibited by the law of the land ought not to be admitted, and they should not be admitted any more because they deny the truth than they should be excluded because they admit the truth. It is not a proper test. So, Mr. President, with those remarks I am willing to submit the question, so far as I am concerned, but I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment, and then the Chair will put the request for the yeas and nays.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the words "admit their belief in the practice of polygamy" and insert "believe in, advocate, or practice polygamy," so that the clause will read, "or persons who believe in, advocate, or practice polygamy."

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to say a word upon this matter before it goes to a vote. I represent in this body in part a large number of people who may be said to be in a way interested in this question for the reasons suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], a people who at one time preached and practiced polygamy. A number of years ago they renounced the practice of polygamy in the most solemn and positive way that a people could, and it has been my belief that they have sought to live up to that renunciation. I have had occasion many times to defend their good faith, and I have done so in the full belief that that renunciation was sincere. They are a most worthy and desirable people from the standpoint of industry, of obedience to law, and of loyalty to the Government. In the thickly settled Mormon communities crime is almost unknown.

Mr. President, I am not willing by my vote to leave what I conceive to be an imputation upon the sincerity, the good faith, and the good citizenship of so many of my constituents. I think if they were called upon as a body they would support this amendment, and, representing, as I do, those people, and believing in them, believing that they acted in good faith, and are now acting in good faith, that this practice has been renounced and its belief no longer a part of their creed, I must vote to favor the amendment, although I doubt if in actual effect it will materially change the bill. If I vote in view of the way in which the question has been raised against the amendment, I leave the world to understand that ten or twelve thousand people in my State believe in that which is denounced by the laws of their country as a crime, that, while they do not practice it for fear of punishment, they nevertheless believe in it—that their renunciation was forced and insincere. That is not my understanding of good faith, and I must represent them as I believe them to be, a sincere and lawabiding people both in their hearts and their conduct, their minds and their practices. I take the responsibility of placing them in that light before the world by my vote.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in relation to this proposed amendment; and, in connection with it, perhaps this is just as good a time as any for me to let the Senate know the attitude of the church in relation to the practice of polygamy.

On April 5, of 1904, at one of the general conferences of the church held in Salt Lake City semiannually, at which there are always from 20,000 to 30,000 members of the church present, action was taken upon the question of the practice of polygamy.

Joseph F. Smith, the president of the church, in speaking at that conference said:

I am going to present a matter to you that is unusual, and I do it because of a conviction which I feel that it is a proper thing for me to do. I have taken the liberty of having written down what I wish to present in order that I may say to you the exact words which I would like to have conveyed to your ears, that I may not be misunderstood or misquoted. I present this to the conference for your action.

This is his official statement:

OFFICIAL STATEMENT.

Inasmuch as there are numerous reports in circulation that plural marriages have been entered into contrary to the official declaration of President Woodruff, of September 26, 1890, commonly called the "Manifesto," which was issued by President Woodruff and adopted by the church at its general conference October 6, 1890, which forbade any marriages violative of the law of the land, I, Joseph F. Smith, president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, hereby affirm and declare that no such marriages have been solemnized with the sanction, consent, or knowledge of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; and

I hereby announce that all such marriages are prohibited, and if any officer or member of the church shall assume to solemnize or enter into any such marriage he will be deemed in transgression against the church and will be liable to be dealt with according to the rules and regulations thereof and excommunicated therefrom.

JOSEPH F. SMITH,
President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

They charge us with being dishonest and untrue to our word. They charge the church with having violated a "compact," and all this sort of nonsense. I want to see to-day whether the Latter-day Saints representing the church in this solemn assembly will not seal these charges as false by their vote.

President Francis M. Lyman presented the following resolution, and moved its adoption:

In this connection I want to say that Francis M. Lyman was and is at present the president of the quorum of twelve—

RESOLUTION OF INDORSEMENT.

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, in general conference assembled, hereby approve and indorse the statement and declaration of President Joseph F. Smith, just made to this conference, concerning plural marriages, and will support the courts of the church in the enforcement thereof."

The resolution was seconded by a number of presidents of stakes and prominent elders.

* * * * * * *

The resolution was then adopted by unanimous vote of the conference.

Mr. President, perhaps I can explain better than anyone present, to the Senator from Missouri and to other Senators, how the amendment would affect immigrants who are members of the church. One of the articles of faith of the church is "that we believe the Bible to be the word of God." The Bible, particularly the Old Testament, sanctions polygamy; and if a Mormon were asked, "Do you believe in the Bible?" he would say, "Yes." Perhaps the immigrant, a member of the church, coming into this country who should be asked that question would have no other thought in his mind than a belief in the Bible.

I want to say to the Senator also that if the president of the church decided to reestablish the practice of polygamy to-day he could not do so. He would not think of undertaking it as long as the law of the land is against it. It is a thing of the past, and it seems to me that it is the wrong time to try to cast reflection—because I can not see it in any other light than as a reflection—upon a people who have in good faith, after the Supreme Court of the United States decided that polygamy was unlawful, in conference assembled agreed that it should not be practiced by the sanction of the church.

I do not want anyone to misunderstand me. There have been sporadic cases since the year 1890; but, as I understand, since the conference of the people passed upon this question, if there has been a single case that was known to the authorities of the church the offender has been excommunicated, just as this resolution stated he would be.

I do not want to ask any special privileges for adherents to my church If immigrants believe in the practice of polygamy, I would say, "Bar them from the United States," but I do not believe they ought to be barred because of a belief in the Bible or a mere belief in a form of religion.

That is the situation of the Mormon people as I understand it, Mr. President. If the Senator from Missouri knew the true inward feeling and the true belief of the Mormon people, I do not believe he would for one minute try to keep that class of people out of the United States, for I want to say now that there is not a more honest, a more industrious, a more God-fearing or liberty-loving people in all the United States than you will find the Mormons to be.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, inasmuch as this question has been presented, I feel that it would not wholly become me to sit in my seat at this particular time, in view of the manner in which the question was raised, and not say a word, for while I am sure no one in this Chamber intended to make any reflection upon a certain people large numbers of which are residents of my State, nevertheless the peculiar way in which the question was raised by the proponent of the amendment might be construed to be some criticism of or thrust at those particular citizens.

Mr. President, until I was 9 years of age, other than my sister and my brothers, I had no playmates whatever except those who were members of the Mormon Church. I knew them in their boyhood and in their beautiful girlhood. A purer or more delightful company of playmates no youth ever knew. They were clean, wholesome, and God-fearing, and have grown up to be useful, honorable, industrious citizens of the State of Arizona.

I knew these boys and girls, of course, before the manifesto of 1890, and it was true that some of the older members of the Mormon Church at that time practiced polygamy, but no more so than many gentiles in some large cities practiced polygamy, except that the Mormons had the nerve openly to admit and support their wives, and those gentiles who practiced polygamy in the cities did not. When I grew to manhood I observed the frugality, the industry, the sobriety, and the honesty of the Mormon people. I presume that next to the State of Utah the State of Arizona has the largest so-called Mormon population, and they are a distinct credit to our State.

After the manifesto of 1890 polygamy or plurality of wives in Arizona among the Mormons ceased; that is to say, so far as the contraction of new or additional marriages was concerned. It was probably true that in some of the isolated parts of the then Territory, now State of Arizona, some of the older Mormons who had in previous years contracted polygamous marriages supported their wives after the manifesto of 1890, but I am within the bounds of truth and conservatism when I say—and I believe I possess some knowledge of the situation—that no polygamous marriages among the Mormons in my State have been contracted since the manifesto. I am very sufficiently convinced that if the hierarchy or the authorities of the Mormon Church should attempt as a policy, which I am certain they never will do—if they should attempt to resume the practice of polygamy, such a thing would not be received among the Mormans in my State, and the Mormans themselves would recoil from it and oppose it just as vigorously as would the gentiles.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is one which I think is designed to, and which does, supplement the recitals of the bill as reported from the committee without being aimed at any particular organization, either religious or secular. If I thought it was, I would not support it. Believing that it is designed for a proper purpose, I am constrained to do so.

I do not think the practice of or abstention from polygamy should be dependent either upon a manifesto or upon a church resolution. It should be prohibited and the prohibition enforced by the laws of the country. The comments of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] indicate to my mind the necessity of a somewhat comprehensive statute upon this subject if it be true that the practice is confined to no section of the country, but prevails as well in some of the large cities of the United States, and perhaps in some which are not so large.

Mr. President, I should not have said anything at all upon this subject but for the fact that reference has been directly made to the Mormon Church, and I should not have done so in that event but for the fact that in the recent campaign I received a circular, a political pamphlet, presumably from members of my own party, directed against the distinguished senior Senator from Utah, who was then a candidate for reelection. That pamphlet, very much to my surprise, not only criticized, but was inclined to abuse the Senator from Utah because of his failure at the time of his investigation to defend the doctrine. I thought it was very much to his credit, and I think so now, that he did not defend it, but the fact that such a circular, designed, of course, for political purposes, was being used in that campaign seemed to me to indicate that some legislation of this sort might be desirable. I say that, too, without intending to reflect upon the church to which the Senator belongs or upon any of its members. The thought which I have in mind is that a subject of this sort should be above and beyond any church declaration and based upon the laws of the country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would not take the time of the Senate to say another word except for the remarks that have been made.

I do not believe there is a man in this Chamber, or in this city, or in this country, who has any more liberal views upon the matter of religious freedom than I have. I did not offer this amendment thinking it would provoke even a discussion. I did not bring it forward for the purpose of harassing the feelings of any person. It seemed to me that the language of the bill is inapt and that it does not produce the result its authors must have intended.

The language of the bill is that no one shall be permitted to come here who admits his belief in, or who practices, polygamy. That is the present language. All I desire to do is to change that language so that the admission of belief or failure to admit belief shall not be conclusive, but that the fact, like any other fact, shall be determined as a fact.

I call the attention of the Senate again to this circumstance: In the sentence immediately following the same test is applied that I now seek to apply to another class of people. Notice:

> Polygamists, or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy; anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow * * * of * * * government.

Not those who admit their belief in, but those who do believe in, the overthrow of government.

This is not a reflection upon those people who live in the State of Utah or elsewhere who have abandoned a practice that is now declared to be illegal. It has no application whatever to them. The bill itself proposes to exclude people who believe in polygamy, but the test in the bill is that they must admit it, not that it shall be a fact. I am simply seeking to make it a fact provable otherwise than by the admission of the immigrant; that is all.

I am very glad to hear from the Senator from Utah that there has been a conformity with the law. The Senator from Utah knows, I think, that when certain charges were sent to me recently, claiming that the practice had been continued, and that there had been absolute defiance of the law, I wrote in response to those charges and said that I did not believe that to be the fact. I remember speaking to the Senator once about the matter.

The whole question resolves itself into this: Suppose an immigrant comes here and says, "I believe in the practice of polygamy." He is excluded. He has been frank. Suppose another immigrant comes who does believe in the practice of polygamy, who does practice it, and who does advocate it, but who refuses to admit it. Should he be admitted? Manifestly not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To which Senator from Utah does the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the junior Senator from Utah, because he first took the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The objection which I make to the Senator's amendment is not based upon his proposition to eliminate the word "admit," but is based upon his proposition to eliminate the word "practice." I would have no objection—I think nobody would have any objection—to leaving out the word "admit" and saying "who believe in or advocate the practice of polygamy."

Mr. REED. I did not leave the word "practice" out of my amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will ask to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. On line 14 it is proposed to strike out the words "admit their belief in the practice of polygamy" and to insert "believe in, advocate, or practice polygamy."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; that is, believe in polygamy or advocate polygamy or practice polygamy.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator would say "believe in or advocate the practice of polygamy or practice polygamy," I should have no objection to it; but I think there is a vital distinction, and, if the Senator will permit me, I think I can point it out to him.

The question of a man's belief rests in his own bosom. I may believe that some particular law is unwise. I may believe that the thing which the law inhibits ought to be permitted to be done; but that ought not necessarily to exclude me from the country, if I believe that the law, as long as it is in existence, ought to be enforced, and if I propose to conform my conduct to the law, and if I am opposed to anybody else breaking the law. We ought not to make the test a mere abstract belief in a doctrine.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, if he will drop down to line 15 he will find that identical language is applied to the anarchist. Anyone who believes in anarchy can be excluded; anyone who advocates anarchy can be excluded. I am simply seeking to apply to the polygamist or the person who believes in polygamy the same language that is applied to the anarchist. You reach, in the second case, the matter of a belief, the matter of an opinion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator may be right about that; but that does not alter the argument I am making. Because one part of the bill may be objectionable, it does not warrant us in making another part of the bill objectionable.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, I think the purpose of the Senator from Missouri is to prevent, if possible, the growth of that sentiment in this country. This does not affect the people who believe in polygamy who are now residents of the United States; but the purpose of the amendment, as I understand it, is to prevent the growth of that sentiment. While a man can not control his thoughts or his conclusions any more than he can the beating of his heart—he thinks as he must, not as he would—the purpose of this amendment is to prevent the growth of the population of America who entertain those views. I think it is a very proper amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri there would be no objection whatever by any member of the church nor could there possibly be objection if his amendment read "or persons who believe in the practice of or who advocate polygamy." Nobody would object to that. I told the Senator in a very few words the reason why, and the only reason why, I or anyone else could object to the words "believe in." I know, or I think I know, what the result will be to the Mormon immigrants if the proposed amendment is adopted. As I stated before, one of our articles of faith is "that we believe the Bible to be the word of God." In that polygamy is sanctioned. I can not see what is going to be gained by the proposed amendment if it means the same as the provision in the House bill, as Senators claim. If it means the same, there is no necessity for a change.

I would go as far as the Senator from Missouri or anyone else possibly could go to prevent any man or woman coming into the United States who believes in the practice of polygamy. I do not care how broad you make the language or how binding. I do not believe that anyone ought to be admitted into the United States who would advocate the practice of polygamy, and I do not care how strong or how broad the language is to accomplish that purpose. But I do not believe that it ought to go to a mere abstract belief in polygamy.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if a man believes in polygamy, he believes in the practice of polygamy and he will sustain the practice of polygamy; and he will uphold the practice of polygamy the very moment he has the opportunity so to do. In parity with that, if a man believes in anarchy he believes in the practice of anarchy. He may not believe that this is the opportune moment to practice it, but he is a potential factor in our life who will manifest his belief by acts when the opportune time comes.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. REED. Now, just a word. I have yielded to the Senator and I will yield again in just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not ask the Senator to yield now.

Mr. REED. The Senator says if a man believes in the Bible he therefore believes in polygamy, and that an immigrant might be asked if he believed in the Bible, and if he said he did he might be excluded, because the Bible advocates polygamy, according to the Senator's theory.

Mr. President, nobody in the Senate except the Senator from Utah believes that any man is going to be excluded at the gates of this country who answers affirmatively the question "Do you believe in the Holy Bible?" but if that were an admission of the belief in polygamy he is already excluded by the terms of the bill as it now stands. The bill now says that a man who admits his belief shall be excluded, and if admitting that you believe in the Bible be an admission of a belief in polygamy then the immigrant would be excluded by the very test the Senator himself sets up.

I repeat, the question of difference is this: The bill says that a man who admits his belief in polygamy shall be excluded. I say the bill ought to read that a man who believes in polygamy should be excluded, whether he admits it or does not admit it. The Government should not be concluded by the simple statement of the individual. The fact ought to determine his admissibility, not his admission of the fact. If the Government could prove that he believed in polygamy, it ought to as effectually as an admission on his part that he believes in it. We are excluding them by the terms of the bill now for the doctrinal reason, for the opinion reason. The sole question is whether that is to be determined absolutely and finally by the admission of the immigrant, or whether it is to be determined as a fact.

I repeat, take two men. One of them comes here and says. "Yes; I believe in the practice of polygamy." He is frank and truthful, and he is excluded. Another man says, "No; I refuse to speak upon it; I say nothing." And yet the Government can prove conclusively that he does believe in the practice. He comes in, while the frank man is excluded.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I really do not think that there is any practical difference in the effect of the two forms of words, those in the bill and those proposed by the Senator from Missouri. They are both designed to accomplish the same object, and I do not think there will be the slightest difference in the practical effect of them.

I do not think the proposal of the Senator from Missouri, which he thinks will make the prohibition stronger, is any reflection upon the people of Utah or the members of the Mormon Church, because we know that they have long since abjured the practice of polygamy. But I am going to vote for the amendment because the question has been raised here, and I would rather not have the people of the country get the impression that the Senate of the United States prefers to make a weak rather than a strong prohibition against the increase of polygamy in the country. I think the fact that the subject has been discussed and that there is a form of words which some Senators think will be more effective as compared with another form which they think will be less effective is in itself reason enough for selecting the stronger form.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I shall not want to precipitate any religious discussion here, but it has been assumed as a fact that the Bible does teach polygamy. I have no doubt at all about the sincerity of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and his people in so construing the Bible, but I shall not want it to go out to the country that the Senate of the United States has admitted as a fact that the Bible does teach polygamy. For myself, I do not believe the Bible teaches any such thing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one word in answer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. The Senator from Missouri made the statement that if a man believes in polygamy he would practice polygamy as soon as the opportunity offered itself. I know that there are men who believe in polygamy who would not practice polygamy when the law of the land prohibits it. One of the articles of the faith of the church is "that we believe in honoring, sustaining, and obeying the laws of the land." It does not make any difference whether the member is a resident of this country or any other country, he must honor and obey the laws of the land in which he lives.

I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that as long as the laws of the land are opposed to polygamy, and the highest court of the land has sustained the law, there is no good member of the Mormon Church who is going to violate that law. He may believe in the abstract principle of polygamy as sanctioned by the Bible. I do not refer to this to get into a controversy with anyone as to what the construction of the Bible may be upon that question, but I wanted the Senate to know the facts as they really exist.

Mr. President, there is one other matter which was brought to my attention by the remarks made by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I do not want Senators to get a misunderstanding of what the real situation is, because I believe every Senator and every public man and every person in the United States ought to know the true situation. There were men who entered polygamy before the manifesto of 1890 who still live with and support their families. They support them, they acknowledge them, and I believe that there is no one in the State of Utah or anywhere else who knows the situation who would not say that under the circumstances that should be allowed.

When people say that polygamy is practiced in the State of Utah, it is only that kind and nothing else, and I want the country to know it. I want the country to know that, as far as I am concerned, if there is any member of the church who would go into polygamy to-day I would say he ought to be handled by the law of the land, and not only by the law of the land but by the rule of the church. That is the situation as it exists, and that is what we believe ought to be done with such cases, and that is what is being done.

But I am fearful, Mr. President, that under the amendment the Senator has offered, wherein it says "any person who believes in polygamy," it will be construed as an abstract belief; and when a member of the church from any foreign country comes to our shores he will be met with the question whether he believes in polygamy in the abstract. I do not see how he can say otherwise than that he does if he believes in the Bible. That is my opinion. I do not say that it is the opinion of others, nor do I criticize anyone for having a different opinion, but that is my opinion. If the proposed amendment goes no further than the present law and means the same, I would have no objection to it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the bill reads at present "or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy."

The Senator from Missouri would change it so as to read "or persons who believe in, advocate, or practice polygamy."

Mr. President, I agree entirely with what the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has said, that in its practical operation there will be very little difference whether the amendment goes into the law or is left out; but I think it makes a very great difference as to the construction which will be put upon the good faith of the tens of thousands of people who live in the great Rocky Mountain country who are identified with the Mormon Church. I have no right to speak, of course, in the way of advice to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], but I am satisfied he could not do his people a greater service than to say that they were ready to be put to the test as to their belief in polygamy. It would seal the lips and silence the tongue of the last and bitterest critic of his church.

Polygamy in the United States is denounced as a crime. The great majority of the people of the United States believe that it is a crime. Even those who practice it believe it is a crime. The great Mormon Church has acquiesced in that denunciation of polygamy and has stood solemnly before the people declaring as a result of its conference that it renounced the doctrine of polygamy. Some of us have had to meet that question upon every political rostrum in the West, and those who have defended the Mormon people and the Mormon Church have done so because they believed they were acting in good faith. The Senator from Utah knows that the good faith of some of us has been challenged because they insisted that we knew that the Mormon people were not acting in good faith. It has been said that we defended them out of political necessity, knowing that they were in their hearts defiant of the laws of their country.

As I said a moment ago, since the president of the Mormon Church announced that polygamy had been renounced by the church I have never doubted for a moment that they were acting in perfect good faith, and knowing the natural disposition of the Mormon people to obey the law, I did not hesitate for a moment to take the position that they were acting in good faith and obeying this law.

But now, Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri offers an amendment which goes to the question whether or not they believe in that which in this country is denounced as a crime, and representing, as I do, some seven or eight or ten thousand, perhaps twelve thousand Mormon people, I am not willing to vote to the effect that those constituents of mine believe in a crime and refuse to practice it simply because the law makes it dangerous to do so.

Let us make no mistake about this, Mr. President. Those people are just as honest, just as industrious, just as patriotic, just as loyal to their country and to their flag as any people who live within our State, and I would just as soon think of saying the other people in my State believe in the commission of crime as to say that they believe in it or to say that they continue to believe in that which they have before the world renounced.

I agree with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that the adoption of the amendment makes very little difference except as to the imputation which it places upon those people and upon the Senate.

Mr. President, so far as the teachings of the Old Testament are concerned, I should like to have some one point me to a paragraph which teaches polygamy. The old Bible tells us of that which we inhibit, to wit, the practice of polygamy, but nowhere in that sacred Book have I been able to find anything which teaches it or recognizes it as a practice worthy of defense or other than a mistake of those people in those early days. When Sarah complained of the presence of Hagar, Hagar, though a mother, was sent into the wilderness to die. The patriarchs never sought to defend their practices, much less to erect their mistakes into a creed or hallow them as a faith.

But it matters little to me, sir, believing as I do in the Holy Scriptures, what the Old Testament teaches with reference to polygamy or with reference to the practice of polygamy. I know that when the new dispensation came and He who made no mistake as to the best interest of the human family renounced it, it no longer found a place in the belief of a Christian people. For 2,000 years civilization has accepted the dispensation which came from the immaculate lips of the Savior to the effect that the old dispensation was at an end, and the people of this country accept the Bible as the last Interpreter gave it to them, and not according to the practice of those who had not felt the effects of His presence upon this earth.

For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother and cleave to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh.

Not wives, but wife; not three, not four, but two, "twain." This is not alone the gospel, but it is the law, and in their light and instructions alone may we safely invite the emigrant to our shores.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and withhold my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], who is absent, and unless I can secure a pair I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. DILLINGHAM's name was called). The senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has been called from the Senate on official business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as upon the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea." I also announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and desire to state that he is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I desire to vote on this amendment, but I should like the liberty of making a very short statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can not be done without unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUGHES. I propose to vote against this amendment for the reason that I do not think a man's religious belief should be made a test of his admission to this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair made a misruling. The Chair does not think the Senator can interrupt the roll call, even by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUGHES. I am satisfied with the statement which I have made. I now desire to vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 3, as follows:

YEAS—54.

Borah	Johnson	Norris	Simmons
Brandegee	Jones	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Kenyon	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Burton	Kern	Overman	Sterling

Catron	Goff	Sherman	Warren
Chamberlain	Hollis	Shields	Weeks
Chilton	La Follette	Shively	Williams
Clark, Wyo.	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Ariz.

So Mr. REED's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I desire to make a statement. I voted the last time and the time before without announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. It was a mere inadvertence on my part.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to inquire, Mr. President, whether there is an amendment pending to strike out the word "solely," in line 11, page 9, of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair is advised by the Secretary, no such amendment is pending.

Mr O'GORMAN. I move that the bill be amended by striking out the word "solely," in line 11, on page 9. It will be noticed in that connection that the provision relates to the exemption of persons escaping from religious persecution. It seems to me that if the word "solely" is retained the advantage intended to be conferred by the committee will be lost to those in whose interest the exemption was inserted in the bill. I think by omitting that word the purpose of those favorable to such exemption will be best carried out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to ask the Senator from South Carolina in charge of the bill if we have not worked long enough to-day?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I venture to ask the Senator if he agrees with me that it is about time for us to adjourn or to take a recess; and if he will agree to have the bill laid aside temporarily to permit the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to report a resolution in which both sides of the Chamber are interested?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I would prefer, if possible, as to-morrow is a holiday, to go on with the bill. It seems to me——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has no expectation of completing the bill to-night, I apprehend?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Unless there are interminable amendments to be offered for the purpose of obstruction and otherwise, I do not see why we should not complete the bill, because, so far as the committee is concerned, there are but one or two further amendments, and they are of minor importance, some of them being merely verbal. As a matter of course, the disposition of the bill is entirely in the hands of the Senate; but we have been considering this bill now for a period nearly going into the third week. There are other matters that necessarily are going to press for attention, and I think that it is due the people of the country and due to ourselves that we should dispose of this measure, so that we may take up other legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is no one more earnest in his desire than am I to have this bill voted on, but it is so clearly evident that we can not vote on it this evening that I venture to suggest that, having been here now nearly seven hours in continuous session, we might well lay the bill aside for the day.

ADDITIONAL MINORITY EMPLOYEE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, without waiting to determine the point at issue, I should like to ask unanimous consent to present from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate a favorable report on a resolution and to have it considered at this time. This is the 31st day of December, the end of the old year, and although the resolution is not of itself of so much importance, time becomes in a sense a part of the essence of it. So, if the Senator will agree——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I agree to lay aside the immigration bill temporarily for the present consideration of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, without prejudice to the standing of the bill in charge of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. President, I wish to say in connection with the resolution that it is one of the routine matters of minority patronage requested by the leader of the minority, agreed to by the leader of the majority, and reported unanimously by the committee to which it was referred. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is more a master of the details of the subject matter than am I——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I do not think there should be any objection to the consideration and adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution (S. Doc. 510) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That an additional employee in behalf of the minority be appointed for service in the folding room of the Senate, at a salary of $1,000 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to ask unanimous consent to report the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. OVERMAN. The whole country is interested in this question.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has objected.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then I will discuss the immigration bill a little.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say that I have been trying to perform——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Has the Senator from North Carolina the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Did not the Chair recognize the Senator from South Carolina?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor; the Senator from South Carolina objected to his presentation of a report at this time, and the Senator from North Carolina stated he would discuss the immigration bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say something about the immigration bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As soon as I conclude discussing the point I was about to make, I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from North Carolina is going to discuss the immigration bill, I shall be very glad to hear him.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that I am in favor of the immigration bill, and do not desire in presenting this report to delay it; but there is an appropriation of $2,500,000 in a provision contained in the urgent deficiency bill to combat the ravages of the foot-and-mouth disease. For the adoption of that item the people of this country are clamoring. All I ask is that the bill be received so that it may be printed. I ask the Senator if he will not yield to have it printed, so that the Senate may examine it and that it may be brought up for consideration when we get through with the immigration bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, we ourselves are suffering terribly here with the "mouth disease," and I must object, unless an appropriation is made to cure that disease in this body. [Laughter.] I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina objects.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I fear there is something the matter with the heads of some Senators, and perhaps we ought to have a little appropriation on that account.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that a motion to lay the pending bill aside would be in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the immigration bill be laid aside temporarily, in order that I may present a report on the urgent deficiency bill, which I desire to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I report back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 20241) making appropriation to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 and prior years, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 848) thereon. I ask that the bill and report may be received and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. SMOOT. Inasmuch as the pending bill has been laid aside, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah introduces a bill, the title of which will be stated.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana whether it is proposed to adjourn or to take a recess?

Mr. KERN. It is proposed to take a recess until Saturday morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. OLIVER. I think there should be some opportunity for the introduction of morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the bill presented by the Senator from Utah be first disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the bill introduced by me be printed in the RECORD, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It has reference to the development of water power.

The bill (S. 7101) providing for the acquisition by a State under certain conditions of any lands therein which are or may become chiefly valuable for the development of water power was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 7101) providing for the acquisition by a State, under certain conditions, of any lands therein which are or may become chiefly valuable for the development of water power.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the manner and subject to the limitations herein prescribed, a State may enter and acquire title to lands within said State which are or may become chiefly valuable for the development of water power.

SEC. 2. That any State desiring to avail itself of the provisions of this act shall make application therefor in the manner following:

Such State shall, through its regularly created board, commission, or other regularly constituted public authority of said State duly vested with the power to regulate and control the rates and service of public utility corporations, including authority to regulate the rates and service of any person, persons, associations, or corporations engaged in the business of developing, distributing, furnishing, selling, and renting electric power, file with the Secretary of the Interior an application setting forth the description of the lands sought to be acquired, accompanied by a map or plat thereof, together with proof that the lands described are chiefly valuable for the development of water power, that the entire area of the land described is necessary to accomplish development of the largest available power at the place designated, and that said application is made for the development of water power in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That such State shall submit proof with such application establishing that the lands described are chiefly valuable for the development of water power and are necessary therefor and are being sought for that purpose, and upon such matters and facts being established, patent therefor or for such portion thereof as is necessary for the purpose aforesaid shall issue as hereinbefore provided to such State. Such patent shall include such lands or all portions thereof as are chiefly valuable for the development of water power and are necessary therefor, including all necessary or convenient dams, reservoirs, canals, conduits, pipe lines, tunnels, transmission lines, roads, power houses, and all other works or structures necessary or convenient for the appropriation and beneficial use of water and the power or other products generated thereby and for the utilization and beneficial use of the same.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act, where application is made by the duly constituted authority of the State, as hereinbefore set forth, shall apply to any part of the public lands of the United States, reserved or unreserved, including national forests, national monuments, and Indian reservations: Provided, That where such lands are located within any national monuments or Indian reservations, the same shall be located under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and in such a way as not to interfere with such national monuments or Indian reservations or the uses or purposes for which the same are created.

SEC. 5. That such patent issued under the provisions of this act shall contain and be subject to the following conditions, limitations, and restrictions, to wit:

First. That said State or Territory shall not alienate the fee simple title to said lands and shall retain the same for the uses and purposes in this act set forth, granting the use thereof for such purposes and subject to the laws of said State and the United States applicable to and adopted for the purpose of controlling and regulating such business and the charges and services th[illegible]of so that the State, or those authorized under its laws to ap[illegible]te and beneficially use such waters, will carry on and continue the service of generating and distributing such electric power.

Second. That each tract of land so patented shall be held by said State and devoted primarily to the development of water power either by said State or Territory or by a municipal corporation or corporations therein or by some person or persons, association or associations, corporation or corporations thereto duly authorized and that said State or Territory shall not devote or permit the same to be devoted to any other purpose or purposes in conflict therewith.

Third. That all power generated, sold, rented, or distributed under authority of said State by any person or persons, association or associations, corporation or corporations, and the rates therefor and the service therefor shall at all times be subject to and shall be regulated and fixed by and under the authority and laws of said State, or in cases involving interstate commerce under and pursuant to the laws of the United States, and that such power so generated shall never be the subject of any combination or consolidation in restraint of trade contrary to or in violation of any law of said State or applicable law of the United States.

Fourth. That none of the properties, rights, uses, or privileges patented under the provisions of this act, where the same are assigned or transferred to or permitted to be used or enjoyed under the provisions of this act, shall ever be valued or allowed to be charged for in connection with any service to the public in excess of such amounts, if any, as the person or persons, association or associations, corporation or corporations shall have actually paid for the same, and in the event of the acquisition of such property, rights, uses, or privileges by such State or any municipality or subdivision thereof, no amount whatever shall be allowed or paid by said State, municipality, or subdivision thereof for such transfer or acquisition in excess of such amounts, if any, as shall have been paid therefor and which shall not have been repaid or reimbursed prior to such acquisition of the same.

SEC. 6. That upon any sale or disposition or attempted sale or disposition of such lands by any State for any other purpose or in any other manner than as herein provided, or upon failure to require said lands to be devoted to the uses required by this act, or upon any violation of the provisions of this act, or of the patent to be issued hereunder, the same shall be forfeited to the United States, and the Attorney General, upon the direction of the President of the United States, is authorized to institute such judicial proceedings as may be necessary for the purpose of ascertaing, declaring, and enforcing such forfeiture.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and appropriate for the purpose of and having the effect of carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of said State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or disposition of water or the right or priority or right to the use of the same now or hereafter vested under and in accordance with the laws of said State.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to introduce a bill and ask for its proper reference.

Mr. OLIVER. I will have to object. I think we ought to have an opportunity to introduce bills in regular morning session, and that we ought to meet at the regular time Saturday morning for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania objects.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the immigration bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina that the Senate resume the consideration of the so-called immigration bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. KERN. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

RECESS TO SATURDAY.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move that at not later than 6 o'clock this evening the Senate take a recess until Saturday next at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. OLIVER. I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana what prospect there is for transacting routine morning business? Some of us have some such business to present.

Mr. KERN. I have no doubt that after Saturday we shall have a morning hour right along.

Mr. OLIVER. The session is getting very short and there ought to be some opportunity of introducing bills and having committees act upon them and also some opportunity of passing unobjected bills; and I suggest to the Senator the propriety, instead of taking a recess until 11 o'clock on Saturday, to adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on that day.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, it is the earnest desire, I think, of a majority of the Senate that the pending bill be disposed of on Saturday, and I have no doubt that it will be disposed of on that day. Then we will resume the usual course of business. It is because of that desire, however, that I have made the motion that at not later than 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until Saturday morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, would it not be possible to take an adjournment of the Senate until 10 o'clock on Saturday morning, so as to allow one hour for morning business between 10 o'clock and 11 o'clock, and begin the discussion of the immigration bill at 11 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like, if the Senator will allow me, to state that I think from present indications—of course I can not tell with certainty, but I think that on Saturday we can get rid of the immigration bill, now under discussion. After that I do not think there will be any difficulty in disposing of the accumulated routine business.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask, just as a matter of information, whether or not, in connection with the consideration of the various bills which will come before the Senate next week or thereafter, it is proposed to dispense with the morning hour?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We seem to have started in on that course.

Mr. KERN. That is not contemplated by anyone, I will say to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that at not later than 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock Saturday morning.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from South Carolina, if we can not reach a vote to-night, why not take a recess at the present time? It is now nearly 20 minutes to 6 o'clock.

Mr. KERN. There are several Senators who desire a short executive session, and I desired to make the motion for a recess now, while there was a quorum present; that was all.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that is the purpose, I have no objection.

Mr. KERN. I have no concealments from the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that at not later than 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until Saturday morning next at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE (S. DOC. NO. 676).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $7,398.58 for expenses of the Revenue-Cutter Service for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on land withdrawals from settlement, location, sale, or entry under the provisions of the act of June 25, 1910, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Rev. A. J. Ziskovsky, of Comfrey, Minn., praying for the exclusion of anti-Catholic publications from the mails, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. ROOT presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for the restoration of a protective tariff, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OLIVER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of contraband of war, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Lodge No. 620, Independent Order B'nai Brith, of Erie, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of General H. W. Lawton Camp, No. 19, United Spanish War Veterans, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., praying for the creation of a national security commission, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of John Harris Council, No. 174, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Harrisburg, Pa., and a petition of Hyde Park Lodge, No. 306, Knights of Pythias, of Scranton, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to civil-service employees, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. BURTON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Ohio, favoring action looking toward the establishment of peace in Europe and the formation of an international police, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Broad Brook, Stamford, Haddam, Danbury, and Rockville, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of contraband of war, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of West Haven, New Britain, Haddam, and Chatham; of Freja Lodge, No. 17, International Order of Good Templars, of Hartford; and of the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Moodus; of the Swedish Lutheran Church, of Hartford; of the Connecticut Baptist convention of 25,000 members, of Hartford; of the Congregational Church of West Stafford; and of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of West Haven, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of local branches of the Connecticut State Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage, of Waterbury, East Hartford, Bridgeport, New Haven, Glastonbury, Guilford, and Cornwall, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Stamford and South Norwalk, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

He also presented memorials of Norwich Camp, No. 75, Order Sons of Zion, of Norwich; of the Council of the United Hebrews, of Waterbury; of the Adath Israel Congregation, of Bridgeport; and of Local Lodge No. 21, Order of B'rith Abraham, and 25 other Hebrew organizations of New Haven, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of General Mansfield Council, No. 9, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Middletown, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES presented a memorial of sundry merchandise brokers, of Seattle, Wash., remonstrating against the war tax as applied to merchandise brokers, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of Fram Lodge, No. 13, International Order of Good Templars, of Everett; of sundry citizens of Tweedle; of Anclor Lodge, No. 3, International Order of Good Templars, of New Castle; and of Lincoln Lodge, No. 122, International Order of Good Templars, of Woodinville, all in the State of Washington, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a letter from J. C. Adams, of Kent, Wash., together with articles and newspaper clippings relating to the Japanese labor problem and immigration. I move that the letter and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 31, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We rejoice, Almighty God, our heavenly Father, in the great precepts enunciated by the Master in the marvelous Sermon on the Mount and in His wonderful parables, acknowledged by a consensus of the purest minded in all the world as conducive to the highest civilization, and we most earnestly pray that we may not only appreciate their worth but make them ours by assimilation and put them into the affairs of daily life after the manner of the Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 31, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: I beg leave to inform you that I have this day transmitted to the governor of the State of New York my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the second district of New York.

Yours, respectfully, DENIS O'LEARY.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19906, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

After the Clerk had completed the calling of the roll, the Speaker announced that 205 Members had answered "present."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that warrants be issued for the absentees and that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to arrest them and bring them in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that warrants be issued for the absentees and that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to arrest them and bring them in.

The motion was agreed to.

Subsequently 14 more Members appeared and answered to their names.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventeen Members are present; a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19906, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the appropriation for the manufacture of postage stamps be so amended that advance payment can be made to the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the printing of postage stamps.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 47, by striking out section 14.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the necessity for this provision. At present, under the law, the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is permitted to do what is known as repay work for the Post Office Department. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing submitted bids for the printing of the postage stamps, and was the successful bidder. Under the provision which is carried in connection with the appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing the work is done out of appropriations made for the bureau, and the bureau is reimbursed by the Post Office Department as the stamps are delivered. What particular advantage there is to be gained by paying the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in advance for this work I do not know. It may have one effect, and one effect only, and that should not, in my opinion, be permitted. In estimating upon this work the bureau fixes as the price the cost of the labor and materials, with a certain percentage added to cover the overhead charges. As nearly as possible it is attempted to do the work at cost, but there is a very considerable profit to the bureau in the doing of the work. Last year the sum of $32,000 was not received from the Post Office Department for such work until after the close of the fiscal year. That sum was a portion of the profit that was made. Not having been received during the fiscal year, it went into the Treasury. If it had been received before the end of the fiscal year, it would have been available in addition to the appropriations made for the bureau. It is very difficult to keep track of what the bureau actually has available each year.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this is a section which the department asked to have placed in the bill. It is one about which the committee care but little, and I understand that the department is not particularly anxious about it. Therefore, if there is any serious objection to the section, or any complication should arise such as the gentleman from New York suggests, I am entirely satisfied to see the section go out of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not see any advantage to the Post Office Department, and for that reason I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing prints these stamps?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. In large quantities?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. And holds them until such time as the department wants them? Is that correct?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They may be stored for the Post Office Department. The bureau makes a contract to print the stamps, and the orders are given and the stamps are printed as required. It may be that they are held in the bureau until delivery is called for.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand; but what I was getting at was whether the Bureau of Engraving and Printing held a large quantity of these stamps until such time as the Post Office Department wanted them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; except that it may be convenient to store them there. That is all. They have no authority to print them until they are ordered, and if they are ordered and printed the department must pay for them.

Mr. FOSTER. They are paid for as soon as they are printed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know the particular arrangement made for the payment. The only result of this provision would be that if they paid for these stamps in advance the bureau would have available for its use, in addition to the appropriation made for its work, the entire profit it may make on this contract. It just so happened that last year $32,000 were not paid until after the expiration of the fiscal year. That sum went into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. If it had been paid before the 30th of June it would have been expended in the bureau, and it adds a certain amount of money over which we have no control, and we can not estimate on how much it would be.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that if there is to be a repealing clause in this act it would be better to put it in as a separate section at the end, where people would naturally look for it. It came in here, I take it, as a part of the bill that we passed last summer.

Mr. MOON. That is true.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman offer an amendment to strike it out of that place and insert it later, if he desires, as a separate section at the end of the bill.

Mr. MOON. We can put it at the end of the bill. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 6 and 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, strike out lines 6 and 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That section 3949 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"All contracts for carrying the mail should be in the name of the United States, and shall be awarded to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guaranties for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement: Provided, however, That such contracts require due celerity, certainty, and security in the performance of the service; but the Postmaster General shall not be bound to consider the bid of any person who has willfully or negligently failed to perform a former contract."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 18 insert the following:

"Whenever it shall be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General that any person is engaged or represents himself as engaged in the business of publishing any obscene or immoral books, pamphlets, pictures, prints, engravings, lithographs, photographs, or other publications, matter, or thing of an indecent, immoral, scurrilous, or libelous character, and if such person shall, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, endeavor to use the post office for the promotion of such business, it is hereby declared that no letter, packet, parcel, newspaper, book, or other thing sent or sought to be sent through the post office by or on behalf of or to or on behalf of such person shall be deemed mailable matter, and the Postmaster General shall make the necessary rules and regulations to exclude such nonmailable matter from the mails."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed to give to the Postmaster General authority which apparently he does not possess at the present time. He discusses the question of obscene and scurrilous matter in the mails somewhat elaborately in his annual report, and calls attention to the fact that considerable complaint has been made of publications characterized as obscene, indecent, and scurrilous in their character.

The Postmaster General reviews the law and the decisions under certain provisions of the criminal code. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States that an immoral and obscene publication to come within the statute must be one which must incite persons to obscene or immoral acts and at the same time tend to degrade public morals. It has been pointed out, however, that there are many matters of a vulgar, coarse, scurrilous, lewd, and outrageously offensive character that do not come within the provisions of existing laws and for which apparently there is no remedy. The pending amendment is so framed that it will not permit injustice to be done to anyone, and yet can hardly be objected to as an improper exercise by an executive department of power which should properly be reposed in it. The proposed legislation requires the establishment of two facts. One is that a person shall be engaged, or shall represent himself as engaged, in the business of publishing immoral books, pamphlets, pictures, prints, engravings, lithographs, photographs, or other publication, matter, or thing of an indecent, immoral, scurrilous, or libelous character. The fact must first be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General that a person is engaged in such business, or represents himself to be engaged in such business, and then being engaged in such business, or holding himself or representing himself to be engaged in such business, that he endeavors to use the post-office facilities to further such business. It seems to me that if these two facts be established regarding any person or enterprise that such a person or enterprise should not be permitted to utilize the mails of the United States in order to promote such a business. I know there are many complaints about various publications that are well founded. They contain matter so offensive to decent men that they should not be transmitted through the mails. It would be impossible and improper to lay down a rule for legislation directed at a particular person or a particular publication. There should be established by law a general rule of conduct to be followed. There should be some authority reposed in some official to prevent the use of the facilities provided by the United States in its mails by anyone engaged in such business——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD (continuing). Or representing himself to be engaged in such business as is outlined in the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended a minute or two.

Mr. MANN. Make it five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a minute—and who attempts to utilize the mails to promote that business. I yield.

Mr. MOORE. Is the gentleman quite sure the Postmaster General does not have authority now to eliminate such publications as the gentleman refers to in his amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not quite sure that he has not such authority. But the Postmaster General has been advised, and his report is based upon the opinion of the Solicitor for the Post Office Department. I believe the question as to just what power the Postmaster General now has is one about which lawyers may differ.

Mr. MOORE. He has the power to prevent the use of the mails for lottery purposes, for instance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statute specifically prohibits the use of the mails for lottery purposes.

Mr. MOORE. And under the Barnhart amendment he has certain other powers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has the power to exclude from the mails a publication upon the wrapper of which obscene or immoral or scurrilous matter is contained; but it has been held by the courts that the matter contained on the first page of a newspaper is not within the statute relating to marks or inscriptions upon the wrappers.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. How far would this proposed amendment extend with respect to magazines which present certain theories of government, and certain newspapers which print articles which are unquestionably scurrilous and perhaps libelous?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it would affect every publication which came within its definition. I have an interesting document——

Mr. MOORE. The theory is that it would cover all newspapers and magazines indulging the practices referred to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would cover every publication which came within its terms. In 1908 President Roosevelt transmitted to the House by message an opinion of the then Attorney General of the United States relative to the exclusion from the mails of a publication issued in Paterson, N. J. The publication was an anarchistic publication that advocated murder, riot, and arson, and the killing of police officers, the seizing of armories, and the dynamiting of the armories if any difficulty were encountered in a proposed attempt to seize them. The President had addressed a communication to the Attorney General in which he said that by his direction the particular publication had been excluded from the mails and would not be admitted to the mails unless by order of court or unless the Attorney General advised him that it must be admitted. He submitted certain questions to the Attorney General, upon which he requested his opinion. I shall not undertake to recite the conclusions of the Attorney General; they are set forth fully in the opinion. I shall read, however, the last paragraph, which is as follows:

While, therefore, in the absence of any express provision of law or binding adjudication on this precise point, the question is certainly one of doubt and difficulty. I advise you that, in my opinion, the Postmaster General will be justified in excluding from the mails any issue of any periodical, otherwise entitled to the privileges of second-class mail matter, which shall contain any article constituting a seditious libel and encouraging such crimes as murder, arson, riot, and treason.

Mr. Chairman, there should not be uncertainty about the law. The use of the mails is a privilege, not a right. Whoever uses the mails should be able to ascertain definitely what the law prohibits from being transmitted and what may lawfully be sent through the mail. If a question is raised with the Post Office Department as to the character of a publication that can or can not be transmitted through the mails, the law should not be so uncertain or indefinite as to permit a legitimate controversy as to whether in the admission or exclusion of a publication there had been any abuse of authority. The Postmaster General is advised that there does not seem to be any law at present which covers obscene, indecent, defamatory, and scurrilous matter, unless the matter be of such character as to incite the imagination and lead to the doing of obscene acts. It is quite apparent, however, that there is a much larger class of material which should be excluded from the mails.

I realize, as all who have ever given any attention to the question, that the isolated or sporadic case can not be reached. No attempt is made to do so. But there are conditions that require no elaborate investigation nor extended discussion to convince decent men that they should not be permitted. Such conditions are covered by the pending amendment. If it be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General that a person is engaged or represents himself as engaged in the business of circulating publications or other matters of the character described in the amendment, and uses the mails to further such business, who will say that the mails should be used for so foul a purpose? No one need fear that the proposed amendment is overdrastic or unreasonable. It is almost identical with section 193 of the Canadian Postal Guide for 1913. There is just as much jealousy of the freedom of the press in Canada as here, but the freedom of the press so essential to a free people should never be confounded with an indecent license; nor under the plea of such freedom should it be permitted to debauch our mails by admitting publications of so outrageously indecent and offensive character as to arouse the resentment of decent men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposition contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is not in order where offered, and it is fairly objectionable from every standpoint. But he said something about the merits of it. We have a Postmaster General to-day. He is in office now. He will go out at some future time. Who will be there 5 years from now or 10 years from now we do not know. The power that is proposed to be lodged in the hands of the Postmaster General under that amendment should not be lodged in the hands of any one man in all this country. [Applause.] It should not be left to the decision of any one man, and he an executive officer and appointed by another man. So this proposed amendment, if you analyze it, means going back in a measure to the sedition laws, and we remember that the execution of those laws cost a great political party its existence.

Now, I am not in favor of scurrilous or obscene matter going through the mails. I am opposed to it, but I think when we legislate here for all the people of this country each and every individual should have redress somewhere, some place of appeal. Under that amendment an ipse dixit of whomever happens to be Postmaster General at the time is absolutely conclusive of what is and what is not objectionable under the proposed amendment. So, in my view there is law enough at present, and if the Postmaster General will exercise to the full his discretion in the premises as to what matter is scurrilous and libelous and tends to incite or create a disturbance of the peace or good order the law is ample. But assuming that it is not, yet here is a matter that affects free speech, so to speak, in this country. Free speech, to my mind, does not mean license, nor should it mean that to any fair-minded man. It does not mean license to abuse the law—not at all. But this proposed amendment, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, has not been considered or reported by any committee. It is a matter of the greatest importance. So the House should not be called upon to pass on a great question like this under the circumstances.

I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is useless to discuss it, Mr. Chairman, as the amendment is clearly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the Chair will permit me, let me say to the gentleman from South Carolina that every power now possessed by the Postmaster General to exclude nonmailable matter, or matter declared to be nonmailable, is a power that is exercised in his discretion, and there would be just as much right to a review in this case as there would be in any other case. The circulation of scurrilous, indecent, obscene, and defamatory matter in the mail is a gross abuse——

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman, with all regard for him, that if he will introduce such a bill and come before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in this House he will have an ample hearing, and not only that, but if the committee sees fit to report it, it will do so promptly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that, Mr. Chairman. Of course I appreciate, and the gentleman from South Carolina appreciates, that even a favorable report upon such a bill at this session of Congress would mean no action. Here is an appropriation bill of 54 pages, with 24 pages of general legislation. Everyone here knows that if there is to be any postal legislation during this session it will have to be contained in this bill and in no other. The circulation of grossly obscene, indecent, scurrilous, and defamatory matter through the mails by whomever it may be circulated is a gross abuse of the privileges of the mails and should not be tolerated. There should be the power lodged some place to prevent such use—or abuse—of the mails. If it be not possessed now by the department it should be given to the department. The amendment which I proposed does not give any authority that anyone can justly criticize. It requires the establishment of two facts, first, that a person is either engaged, or holds himself out as engaged, in the circulation of matter of the offensive character described, and, secondly, is attempting to use the Post Office Department to further that business. I do not believe anyone can justify toleration of a situation that would permit a man to engage in such a business and use the Post Office facilities to promote it.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, we would like to go on with the bill, and I ask for the regular order.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. FINLEY. I will yield, of course.

Mr. FALCONER. I wanted to ask if it is not something of a dangerous precedent to establish to put this kind of an amendment or provision in a bill of this character, giving the Postmaster General the power when the common laws cover the point, and where anyone who now sends this kind of literature through the mails is subject to the penalties of the laws now on the statute books? I am against this amendment. I think it is un-American.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law does not cover it, apparently. It is asserted that the literature or publication must be of such a character as to be not only obscene, but to incite a person to the perpetration of obscene acts. There is a great mass of literature of a grossly obscene and indecent character that should not be permitted to be transmitted through the mails which will not incite the perpetration of obscene acts.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, under what rule is the gentleman now proceeding?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous consent of the committee. If the gentleman makes the point of order——

Mr. TRIBBLE. I make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That the act of March 4, 1909 (ch. 321, sec. 198, 35 Stat., p. 1126), be amended to read as follows:

"Whoever shall willfully or maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail on any mail route, or shall break open the same, or shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail deposited therein, or shall willfully take or steal such mail from or out of such letter box or other receptacle, or shall willfully aid or assist in any of the aforementioned offenses, shall for every such offense be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 51, in line 2:

After the word "same," insert "or shall deposit any circular or other printed matter not intended for the mails in the same."

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not subject to the point of order. It is dealing with the subject matter of the section. It should have been put in in the committee. It was a question that the committee had agreed upon anyhow to report as a part of the section.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois will excuse me, I did not catch the full import of the amendment by the reading of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MADDEN. It simply prevents the littering up of the boxes. I ask for its adoption, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the gentleman if that amendment will apply to boxes in the rural districts, for instance, where men put circulars in the rural mail boxes?

Mr. MADDEN. If the matter is not intended for delivery through the mails, it would.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I think I would like just a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized.

Mr. BRYAN. It is a common practice in the rural districts for a man to pass along the road and distribute circulars, for instance, which he wants the various farmers to get; and it is the practice for him to put those circulars in the rural mail boxes, and the farmer gets them. Candidates for Congress sometimes do that same thing in campaigning through the country. They go along a country road and put their cards and announcements in those boxes; and those boxes are owned by the people. If the gentleman refers to those boxes, I certainly think we ought to consider his amendment very carefully before adopting it.

Mr. MADDEN. The boxes are owned by the Government, or they are under the control of the Government, although they may be purchased by individuals; and they are United States mail boxes and subject to all the rules and regulations that govern the use of mail boxes, and nobody ought to be allowed to introduce any matter into any of those boxes that is not intended to go through the mails. If any person wants to communicate with people of a given territory, he ought to put his communication in an envelope and put a postage stamp upon it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under a recent regulation of the Post Office Department people in towns and cities having free delivery are required to furnish a box if they wish to have their mail delivered.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if such boxes are subject to the control of the Post Office Department, and whether the provision he suggests would affect the depositing in those boxes of some matter that was not deposited with the intention of going through the mails?

Mr. MADDEN. I think they are under the control of the Post Office Department, and it is a regulation of the department now that wherever new delivery service is extended in any city in the United States the owner of the house to which mail is to be delivered shall, in advance of the mail delivery, be required to put such a box in place. Now, that box ought not to be incumbered with all kinds of rubbish.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There are deliveries, I will say to the gentlemen in rural service where newspapers deliver their daily issues; and would the gentleman have it so that they can not deposit those newspapers in those boxes that were put up for the purpose of receiving mail?

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the gentleman has reference to county newspapers?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They may be daily newspapers.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think that anything that is not permitted to go through the mails should be placed in any one of these boxes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the gentlemen have used all my time; but this amendment should not be adopted. I think we would make a mistake if we should adopt an amendment here that permits a fine of a thousand dollars to be imposed or a penalty of imprisonment inflicted if a person puts into a receptacle that is used for the purpose of receiving mail anything that is not intended to go through the post office.

It seems to me it would be absurd. In our cities we have our little boxes at our doors, and men passing along distributing circulars and newspapers deposit the circulars and newspapers in them. That is the very place to put them. They are not designed to go through the mails at all. The boxes are ours. They are intended for the reception of mail and information; and it is right that those things should be put there.

In the country districts the boxes are put up along the roadway by the farmers and inhabitants of the rural districts for the convenience of the people, as receptacles for all kinds of information, for notices of farmers' grange meetings, and notices of church meetings, and all such notices are put in there so that the farmers and the people living in the houses can know what is going on and can be governed in their actions by the announcements. I think the gentleman's amendment goes entirely too far.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman would be willing to admit that the permission to put such matters in the boxes defeats the purpose of the department to collect postage for all mails?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe so at all. I do not believe that the class of information and pamphlets and circulars that I have referred to would go through the mail, although it may be possible that in some cases they would do that. But we are not running the Postal Service like a Chicago department store. We are not running this Post Office Department for the sake of making money out of it. We are running it for the purpose of disseminating information, and where information can be disseminated without a penny of cost to the Government we do not wish to derive any revenue from it. If that could be done all over the country, we would not have any post office; if the information could go out sufficiently without it, we would not have it. In all these offenses that are enumerated malicious intent is involved; yet by this amendment the putting of a notice of a grange meeting into a box, without malice of any kind, would be a crime, just the same as if a man should take an ax and cut down the box. I believe the gentleman from Illinois has a worthy purpose in view and has in mind the elimination of a real evil, but I believe this amendment is entirely wrong and entirely too far-reaching.

Mr. MADDEN. I believe that the gentleman would concede that if a man deliberately put into a box something that ought not to be there he would be doing it willfully?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; there is not much to the word "willfully" by itself; if, however, something in the nature of acid or ink or some disfiguring substance of that kind is put into a mail box for the purpose of destroying the contents, that would be willful and malicious, but to put notices and announcements of grange meetings and church meetings in boxes at the front doors of people, erected there by the resident for the reception of circulars and information, and in front of the houses of farmers in the rural districts, I do not believe it would be out of place, and I certainly am opposed to the passage of such an amendment as the gentleman has offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is one of the best-posted and one of the most industrious men on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. His judgment is usually correct. But in the case of this amendment I am persuaded, Mr. Chairman, that because of his surroundings in a great city where crimes are so often committed he is not fully in sympathy with the views, customs, and habits of the country cities and towns and the country itself. It is said that the post-office box belongs to the Government, and that the Government should have control over it. It is true that the Government ought to have control over the box in a sense, but I desire to inform my colleague that in the country, where there is rural mail delivery, the boxes are very often left entirely open for convenience, so that any matter of use and information may be deposited therein.

Mr. FINLEY. And they are owned by the patrons.

Mr. FOWLER. They are owned by the patrons, who have a vested interest in them which should not be taken away from them by any authority whatever. Indeed, I know of boxes in the country which have been left open until the birds have built nests in them; and if you are going to impose a fine upon the depositors in the box you will have to extend it to the birds; and who would want to fine those beautiful songsters which enliven the homestead of any man in the country? [Laughter and applause.] I am inclined to believe that if the gentleman had ever lived in the country he would withdraw his amendment and say to those people who are anxious to get any piece of information that they can that they have certain vested rights which ought not to be taken away from them.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. With pleasure.

Mr. HOWARD. Under the procedure proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] an English sparrow could not get a fair and impartial trial in the country, and he is the bird that uses the mail boxes.

Mr. FOWLER. Gentlemen in the city are not used to these songsters as we are in the country. Of course, as I understand, the amendment does not propose to deal with that question. But, Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness I think this amendment is too drastic, and I trust it will be defeated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it may be that this proposition is a little hard upon the rural free-delivery boxes. I do not know. For years the Post Office Department has been endeavoring to compel people who live in the cities to provide receptacles for the mail, on the idea that it would hasten the work of delivering the mail. Many houses and apartments have little mail boxes at the entrance. People who engage in circular delivery in the cities have taken advantage of this situation, and in many places to-day, in the city of Chicago, and I doubt not elsewhere, it is impossible for the postman to put the mail in the mail box, because it is already filled up with circular matter put in by circular-distributing agencies. Now, there ought to be some way of preventing that. The people who own the boxes do not want circular matter. The circular agencies can distribute these circulars more cheaply by sending persons around with them than they can by sending them through the mails; and I have had, and I doubt not my colleagues and other Members from the cities have had, many protests from patrons, because it was impossible for them to have their mail put into the receptacles which they had prepared, because those receptacles were filled daily with so-called circular matter, sometimes almost printed books, put in by these distributing agencies. The Government will never succeed in getting the people of the cities completely to put in mail boxes until they protect those boxes for the use of the mail. Every once in a while the Post Office Department issues a statement that it will refuse to deliver mail in the city at any house where there is not a receptacle. I receive such a notice once in a while. I never had a receptacle except for a short time, and it became such a nuisance, from the circular matter, that I tore it out and threw it away, and I do not propose to put in one until there is some sort of protection. Of course, I know that the bluff about not delivering the mail does not go. It is a pure bluff. I am old enough to know better, and have had experience enough to know that the Government will not refuse to deliver the mail. When it goes to the trouble of paying a dollar to carry a letter to somebody in Alaska who has not a mail receptacle I am very sure it is not going to refuse to deliver the mail because the carrier does not want to ring the bell.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I should like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that in all cities there are a great many apartments that do not maintain a telephone system or have a clerk in charge, and as you enter the apartment building there is a mail box belonging to each of the apartments, and there is also a bell connected with each apartment? Callers ring the bell of the apartment desired and if the occupant is in he will answer the call by talking through a speaking tube. If no one is in the apartment, the caller usually deposits a card in the mail box or a note that he may wish to leave for the person he is calling upon. Would the gentleman say that ought to be prevented?

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether that ought to be prevented. Of course, it is true that the modern apartment building usually has these boxes. It is also true that there is a great protest now against the misuse of them.

Mr. BORLAND. I assume it is true in Chicago, as it is in most cities, that they have city ordinances governing the distribution of circular matter, and if it becomes a nuisance to distribute circulars in a certain way—for instance, if thrown on doorsteps or in hallways—the city can prevent it by ordinance; and the city could, by ordinance, prevent the distribution of circular matter to apartment houses in the way which has been stated.

Mr. MANN. A city can not by ordinance prevent the putting of this matter in the mail boxes. That question has been decided.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I do not care whether the gentleman agrees with me or not. It has been decided in our city that it could not be regulated in that way.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the distribution of circulars can be controlled by city ordinance, it makes no difference how they are distributed.

Mr. MANN. That is another thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting at the end thereof the following: "where such boxes are located in the corporate limits of cities of 300,000 population or more."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to that because my city of Seattle contains a population of 310,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is simply this: I can readily realize that the use of mail boxes in large cities for the distribution of circular matter and the defeat of the collection of postage by the Government is probably greatly abused, but in the country districts and the smaller cities no such condition exists. Especially is this true in the country. I know that the rural delivery boxes are used by people in the country who never go near the post offices and who sometimes live 8 or 10 or 12 miles from the post office; they are used by school-teachers for the distribution of efficiency cards of scholars; and sometimes a farmer will send down by some friend for an article which is deposited in the mail box as a matter of convenience. The farmers erect these boxes at their own expense, and there is no abuse of this kind in the country. If this amendment were adopted, it would work a great inconvenience upon the rural element of our population. On the other hand, I believe that in the large cities it is abused. So far as the population of Seattle, which the gentleman says is 310,000, is concerned, I, of course, made the limit 300,000 as an arbitrary limit, but if the gentleman wants to amend it by making it 250,000, all right.

Mr. BRYAN. I should want to put it at 350,000 or 400,000, because Seattle will soon reach 400,000 anyway.

Mr. HOWARD. There may be a time when Seattle will dwindle to 200,000, so the gentleman had better put it down. But, Mr. Chairman, that is the purpose of my amendment, and I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not be adopted unless my amendment is adopted.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity for this distinction between cities of a certain size; in fact, there is no necessity for the amendment at all. It appears from the statement of the two gentlemen from Illinois that the only purpose of this amendment is to correct an abuse of the distribution of circular and advertising matter by private distributing companies in the city of Chicago. That matter can be controlled in cities by ordinance. The cities license the distributing companies, and can provide ordinances under which they can do business. They do not have to license these companies. The amendment would cut out in all cities of 300,000 and over what the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] spoke of—people going to call on some one in an apartment house where there is nothing but a small hallway with mail boxes with tenants' name on them. If you do not find the person you wish, you put a card in the box and perhaps a message. That is done commonly in every city, and this proposed amendment would cut that out.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the gentleman is mistaken; it does not affect that class of matter; it says "circular matter." If the gentleman will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, he will see that that is a fact.

Mr. BORLAND. The circular matter can be easily controlled by a local ordinance, and no amendment is necessary for that.

Mr. HOWARD. They would have to engage in the business of distributing circulars. You could hire a small boy to distribute the circulars.

Mr. BORLAND. There could be no great evil growing out of the distribution of circulars by a small boy.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, so far as I know this amendment does not come with any recommendation from the Post Office Committee.

Mr. BORLAND. The whole amendment ought to be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia wish to change the figures in his amendment?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That section 3938 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"All letters of domestic origin which can not be delivered by postmasters shall be sent to the Post Office Department, and such as contain inclosures of value, other than correspondence, shall be recorded. If the sender or addressee can not be identified, such letters shall be held for a period of one year awaiting reclamation. If within one year they have not been claimed, they shall be disposed of as the Postmaster General may direct.

"All other undeliverable letters shall be disposed of without record and not held for reclamation."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting some information from the chairman of the committee with reference to this section. Section 3938 of the Revised Statutes seems to have been entirely rewritten in this bill. From the report of the Assistant Postmaster General the purpose seems to have been to cut the period of holding certain dead letters from four years to one year.

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask what was the purpose in rewriting the section in the manner in which it has been written?

Mr. MOON. I do not know that I could tell the gentleman that there is any purpose except to put it in better shape. The purpose, the gentleman will understand, of changing from one year to four years is to prevent the vast accumulation of this matter. Much of the matter is valueless after a year, if not all of it, and it was thought best by the department to dispose of all of this matter promptly.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that what I have in mind particularly is the first two lines:

All letters of domestic origin which can not be delivered by postmasters shall be sent to the Post Office Department.

The next section in the statute provides that where letters can not be delivered, if there is a return card upon the envelope, they shall be sent to the addressee. My query is whether the language—

All letters * * * which can not be delivered must be sent to the Post Office Department—is in conflict with the present language of the next section of the statute?

Mr. MOON. I think where the addressee can be reached it will be sent to him.

Mr. LENROOT. Is that a delivery?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the only question I had in mind.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That on and after July 1, 1915, the compensation of each rural letter carrier for serving a standard route of 24 miles and over, six days in the week, shall be $1,200 per annum, payable monthly; on routes 22 miles and less than 24 miles, $1,152; on routes 20 miles and less than 22 miles, $1,080; on routes 18 miles and less than 20 miles, $960; on routes 16 miles and less than 18 miles, $840; on routes 14 miles and less than 16 miles, $720; on routes 12 miles and less than 14 miles, $672; on routes 10 miles and less than 12 miles, $624; on routes 8 miles and less than 10 miles, $576; on routes 6 miles and less than 8 miles, $528; on routes 4 miles and less than 6 miles, $480. A rural letter carrier serving one triweekly route shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half the length of the route served by him, and a carrier serving two triweekly routes shall be paid on the basis for a route one-half of the combined length of the two routes: Provided, That, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "each," in line 9, page 52, and add the letter "s" to the word "carrier," in line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 52, in line 9, by striking out the word "each" and adding the letter "s" to the word "carrier."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this section involves very largely a section that was incorporated in the last Post Office appropriation bill. At the time the last section increasing the salaries of the rural-route carriers was incorporated in the Post Office appropriation bill there was no demand for it at all on the part of the Post Office Department. In fact, the Postmaster General before our committee explicitly made the statement that while none of his employees, he believed, were overpaid, yet he believed they were all paid sufficiently high salaries, and he made no demand or any request whatever for any increase of salary.

Congress, however, in its wisdom or unwisdom—and I shall not undertake to say which—increased the salaries of the rural route carriers $100 per year. At that time there were approximately 43,325 rural route carriers in the United States, and that necessitated an appopriation of $4,325,000 to comply with the law passed by Congress. But in the readjustment of the salaries of the rural route carriers, which took place on the 1st of last July, the Post Office Department took into consideration certain additional equations that prior to that time had not been taken into consideration in fixing the salaries of the rural route carriers. Prior to the 30th day of last June the distance alone was the controlling consideration which governed the salary of the rural route carrier, 24 miles being fixed as the standard route; but when the Post Office Department on the 1st of last July undertook a reclassification of the salaries of the rural route carriers and to apportion the extra $100 per year which Congress sought to give them it added two more elements, the weight and distance of the routes. It is true that the Post Office Department did not consume all of the $4,325,000 which would have been necessary to carry out the express will of Congress, but in the reclassification it did add approximately $1,871,000. In other words, in order to carry out the idea of the reclassification, the Post Office Department took $1,871,000 of the $4,325,000 which Congress had appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. HOWARD. Did it not also add length of time, making it weight, time, and distance in the reapportionment?

Mr. COX. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I thought there might be some question as to whether or not the Postmaster General had the power under the law to make that additional classification. On August 7, 1914, I addressed a letter to the Post Office Department with a view of seeing whether or not, under the law that was in force on the 1st of July last, the department had the power to take into consideration these other elements in the reclassification of the salaries of the rural route carriers. I shall not take the time to read all of the letter, but quote just this portion of it:

I beg to inform you that the act of April 21, 1902 (ch. 563, 32 Stats., 113), provides that the Postmaster General is authorized to classify the Rural Delivery Service and fix the compensation of employees in such service.

The Post Office Department or the Solicitor of the Post Office Department, at the request of the Postmaster General, replied that under the law which I have just read the Post Office Department had a clear right to reclassify the salaries on the 1st of last July, taking into consideration these two other elements that have never been taken into consideration by the Post Office Department prior to this readjustment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask Members of the House whether or not it is right to absolutely undo everything that the Postmaster General has done, which will be done if the word "each" remains in the bill, because that fixes positively and definitely, in my mind, an increase of salary of $100 per year to each rural-route carrier in the United States? Before this work was undertaken by the Post Office Department exhaustive inquiries were inaugurated by the department with a view of seeing how much mail was carried by the rural-route carriers in different sections of the United States. It was found, and found indisputably to be true, that in many, many sections of this country the average weight of mail per day did not exceed 15 pounds.

In many, many sections of this country the average weight of mails carried per day by the rural-route carrier was less than 15 pounds. In many sections of the country it ranged all the way from 15 pounds up to 150 pounds per day, while, again, in many sections of the country, particularly in the West, Northwest, and up in the New England section, they carry from 4,000 to 5,000, 6,000, and 7,000 pounds per day, and yet they carried it at the same wage that the rural-route carrier got who only carried from 5 to 10 pounds per day. I believe this ought to be apportioned along the line of the amount of work that is done by the rural-route carrier, and I do believe that the Post Office Department in its reclassification has done equal and exact justice to all the rural-route carriers.

Mr. HOWARD. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. COX. I yield for a question.

Mr. HOWARD. Does not the gentleman think distance ought to be the standard of measurement upon which the salaries of the rural carriers should be fixed?

Mr. COX. No; I do not. I think other elements ought to enter into it.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman state why that should not be the standard of measurement of the pay?

Mr. COX. Because if distance alone is to control, a man might by the use of a motor cycle travel 30 miles much easier and much quicker and much faster than a man would be able to travel the same distance who drove a buggy or used a two-horse wagon to haul that load.

Mr. HOWARD. Does not that fall upon the carrier himself who has got $270 invested in a motor cycle, whereas he would have only $70, $80, or $100 invested in a horse?

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. BORLAND. I wish to ask the gentleman for information. Was I correct in understanding the gentleman to say that some carriers carried 6,000 to 7,000 pounds?

Mr. COX. They do.

Mr. BORLAND. A day?

Mr. COX. They do.

Mr. BORLAND. By what sort of a process do they carry it?

Mr. COX. I do not know; but that is exactly what the investigation disclosed that was put on foot by the Postmaster General.

Mr. BORLAND. There is a vast difference in the amount carried by different carriers?

Mr. COX. Surely.

Mr. BORLAND. Some carry as low as 15 pounds and some carry as high as 5,000, 6,000 and 7,000 pounds?

Mr. COX. That is true. Some of the extreme routes in the northwest and in the northeast parts of the country carry from 4,000 to 6,000 pounds and only get about $1,100 for their entire work.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hope this amendment will not pass if the amendment has the effect which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] says it will have. I have always believed that the distance traveled by the carrier was the true basis upon which to fix salaries. Now, it seems that the Postmaster General disagrees with Congress upon this method of fixing salaries, and has added three other requirements for the carrier to fulfill before receiving the maximum pay provided for the carrier in the last Post Office appropriation bill, to wit, weight, number of pieces handled, and number of hours consumed in covering the route. Now, here is the thing we must not lose sight of, and it is very important to a man who is actually carrying mail on a route. For instance, suppose a rural carrier had only two pieces of mail and one of those pieces of mail was for a patron at the first box on his route and the other piece of mail was for the patron at the last box on the route and he had a 24-mile route. It would necessitate that carrier making that entire trip. Why? Because of the fact he is supposed to take up the mail deposited in the boxes and bring that in, and he is supposed to deliver the mail on that route.

Mr. RUCKER. And suppose he had none?

Mr. HOWARD. And suppose he had none, as suggested by my friend from Missouri. If he had not a single piece, he would have to go over that 24-mile route six days in the week. Now, it is easy to sit up here in Congress and talk about rural carriers being overpaid. I believe they are getting now a fair rate of compensation. I believe the carriers will be satisfied if they actually receive the compensation Congress voted them. I believe they are going to remain satisfied for some years to come, because the pay as now fixed is about what it ought to be, but when you take into consideration the monotony of the work, the covering every day of the same distance under changing conditions—rain, cold, snow, frozen and very bad roads—I think that distance ought to be the basis of pay, because it does not make any difference with a fellow when he is on the route as to whether he delivers 150 or 250 or 500 pieces of mail if he is on it.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. I will.

Mr. LLOYD. Does the gentleman mean to say that the rural carriers now are satisfied with the present interpretation of the law?

Mr. HOWARD. No; I did not mean to say that. What I meant was——

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the rural carriers were satisfied with their present pay.

Mr. HOWARD. That this law as now drawn, and as it will be if this word "each" is not stricken out, will be satisfactory; then that makes it mandatory upon the Postmaster General to pay them the salary we voted them in the last Congress.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman states the rural carrier was satisfied. Of course he is not satisfied and has not been satisfied since the 1st day of July.

Mr. HOWARD. I meant this, if I did not make it clear: If the salaries of the mail carriers are predicated upon the law as it was intended by Congress when it passed legislation last year that each carrier should receive this additional $100.

Mr. BORLAND. Assuming that there is a difference of from 15 pounds to 7,000 pounds in the amount that is carried daily by different carriers, does the gentleman undertake to say that difference ought not to be taken into consideration at all in the fixing of the pay?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, yes; I think that difference ought to be taken into consideration by increasing——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOWARD. In an isolated case, like my friend from Missouri has mentioned, I think it ought to be taken into consideration. I do not believe there is any rural carrier in the United States who is carrying, on the average, 7,000 pounds of mail a day. I think that is a dream that some inspector in the Post Office Department has had.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose it ran from 10 pounds to 1,000 pounds?

Mr. HOWARD. That should increase the wages of the man who was carrying the 1,000 pounds and let the wages of the man who was carrying 10 pounds remain the same. Or abolish the 10-pound route. These routes are patronized or they would not have been established. And so, when you go to taking in the time element and piece element, and go around and undertake to predicate the carrier's salary on that, you will continue to keep him up in the air as to what he is going to receive. And there is one common-sense principle upon which to predicate it, and that is the distance and the time it takes that man to travel that route. Now, they say he employs an automobile. If he does, he has probably $500 or $1,000 invested in it. That is his investment and not the Government's. If he drives a slow horse, that is his misfortune; if he drives a fast horse, that is his good fortune. The carrier is the man that bears the brunt of the expense incident to the operation of his route. And I say, Mr. Chairman, that this particular word ought not to be stricken from the bill. It ought to be plain and unmistakable that the Government intended that these rural carriers have this $100 increase. And no man, be he Postmaster General or anybody else, ever should have the right to vary the intention of Congress and divert a fund that we have appropriated for a certain class of our employees and withhold it from them when we have said that they should have it.

It is threatened by some that if we allow fair compensation for rural carriers the service will be placed on a contract basis. Let me, in conclusion, sound a word of warning, be you Democrat or Republican: Woe unto the political life of him who destroys the efficiency of the farmers' mail service. [Applause.] That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose the passage of this section of the bill, but to make some observations that I offer to the House and to the committee for whatever they are worth. I have always been very friendly to this service. I believe the country people are entitled to it and that it ought to be maintained. I believe I was on the committee when, by a single vote, in the experimental stage of this service, the amount was raised from $350,000 to $750,000, and I have voted for the increase until it has reached the amount that it is to-day. But there is an end to all things, and there ought to be an end to the depletion of the Federal Treasury in the interest of any class of officials. That these men are getting now that to which they are entitled I have not the slightest doubt. But, as I remarked, I am not going, in view of the fact that I know that the southern carriers in the Southern States form a great part of the Democratic political machine in that section and in the Northern States form a great part of the political Republican machine, to let it change my opinion. I know it is very hard to run against one machine, but when you confront two you are in very great trouble.

I want to make this suggestion: This great service, this valuable service, a service that ought to be continued and not impaired, is now losing to the people of the United States, if I recollect aright, about $39,000,000 of money per annum. In other words, if it were not performed we would save that much. Or, again, the benefits that come from it, so far as revenue is concerned—and of course that is not all the benefit as compared with the actual cost—produce a deficit of $39,000,000. The department has said to you, and says in this very report, that if you are willing to let the department contract for this service instead of having it performed by carriers who hold their office for life at a fixed salary, they can obtain at every office in the United States men who will perform the service as well and will give to the country as efficient service in every way as possibly can be had for a much less sum of money than you are now paying. In other words, they present to this Democratic House, standing upon a platform demanding economy and reform, a proposition that if you will permit them to contract this service they guarantee to you a saving of from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000 on this item every year.

I am not going into the discussion of the wisdom of the contract service as against the other service. I am not making observations to attempt to influence anybody on this side, but I want you to vote with your eyes wide open on this question, because you do not know what is coming after a while.

Another thing, you are taking away, if you pass this section without the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana being incorporated, the discretion we place upon the Postmaster General now on the question of salaries, a wise discretion that has never been taken from any Postmaster General heretofore.

You say that every route of 24 miles shall receive a compensation of $1,200. You speak in figures as to the shorter route, on down the scale. Now, let us stop and think about that for one minute. I do not care whether you are anxious to serve your carriers, your country, or yourselves—anyway you want to put it—and I am not censuring you about your position at all, but give you full credit in your desire to perform your service as you think best—but take it from any view that you want, and I submit to you as a common-sense proposition, one that a wayfaring man, though a fool, can see the point of, that if a man on a 24-mile route over a good road, who has 3 pounds of mail to carry on a bicycle or automobile, and can perform that service in three to six hours, ought he to be paid as much for the service performed on that route as the man who has to travel in a wagon over bad roads and be out 12 to 15——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON (continuing). Be out in the weather 12 to 14 hours, and carry from 2,000 to 4,000 pounds a day? Now, any sensible man knows if you give those two men the same compensation that it is not just, that it is not fair. Therefore it follows that if you are going to determine a compensation for a carrier that is just, you must take into consideration the elements that affect the service; that is, the number of packages that he has to handle and the weight of those packages. Why? Because while it may take one man practically the same length of time to travel the route as the other, he has got to handle packages that the other does not handle. They are more or less heavy and more or less numerous, and the time consumed is very much greater by one than the time consumed by the other. I suggest to you that you do not tie the hands of the Postmaster General along that line. It is not a wise thing to do.

I am not going to vote against this section. As chairman of the committee, it is proper for me to state these facts. I do not care what you do about it. I am going to tell you as I did about the assistant postmasters. I am going to prophesy again, that if you do this, if you destroy this discretion of the Post Office Department, you take away the only protection the people have against the plunder of the Treasury along this line. The power that exists in the department under the general law will be sufficient to wipe out and put under the contract system more than half of the postal routes in the United States if they want to exercise that power, which I hope the necessity may not arise to do. I am opposed to it. I want to retain the carriers. I want to retain the routes. I want to give just compensation. I want the country people to have the benefit of it. But if it is to come down to a question of plundering the Treasury of my country and turning over its revenues to men who do not perform service commensurate with value received, if it comes to the point where the judgment of the department must be overridden in the interest of any class of officials, then I want to say that I believe if the power exists under the law and the Constitution, the department ought to exercise it—and I do believe it—to discontinue these routes, in part, and establish the old post office again, and make it nonaccounting, so that practically it will be of no cost to the Government, and enlarge the power of the star-route carrier so as to give him, in effect, some of the powers and duties of the rural carrier. Then the service can be performed perhaps as well as now.

I want to impress upon you the fact that I am not going to oppose this section. I am not going to make any objection to it. I know you are head bent—I might use another word with propriety—on passing this section. I know you are. But, as one who wants to preserve the rural routes, as one who has been interested in them from the very beginning of the experimental stage, and as one who believes it would be better to continue this service as it is than to discontinue it, I want to say to you that the Government and people can not afford to assent to the passage of such laws, because it will not be justified.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman prognosticate that if the Cox amendment is not passed, in a few months or years the Rural Delivery System will be under contract?

Mr. MOON. No; I think if you continue to pass provisions of this sort the Government will be forced, under the power it has now, to abandon a lot of these routes, which will put you back to the star routes, which I would regret very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, let us understand exactly what is the force and effect of this amendment if adopted. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], the author of the amendment, and the chairman of the committee [Mr. MOON] both say that the effect of it will be to continue present conditions. If this amendment is defeated, then, instead of having the conditions as they exist at the present time throughout the United States, of which the people as well as the carriers are complaining, they will be prevented.

The proponent of the amendment [Mr. Cox] said that by reason of the fact that the will of Congress in making the appropriation at the last session of Congress was not carried out a saving of something like $3,000,000 was made possible, as that amount was not used. Congress appropriated so much to carry out a certain specific and well-defined purpose, and that purpose was to increase the salaries of the rural carriers in this country on standard routes $100 per annum, and upon routes of shorter length a proportionate amount. It was not only intended that that should be done, but Congress appropriated the identical sum of money necessary to carry out that intention and purpose. The Postmaster General, under rules and regulations which he promulgated and adopted in the Post Office Department, prevented the increase of $100 per annum by taking into consideration other matters, to wit, distance, and the weight and number of packages which the rural-delivery carrier carried along his route, and the time necessary for him to perform the service.

Now, then, the question with you, my friends, the question with us all, is whether or not we shall have the intention and purpose of Congress carried out; whether our intention and purpose shall be adopted and shall be executed, or whether the construction of the Post Office Department shall prevail over the intention and purpose of Congress, which is well known by every Member on this floor.

Now, then, the chairman of the Committee says that it is dangerous to take away this discretionary power from the Postmaster General and fix these salaries ourselves. Is it more dangerous to take it away from him than it is to take it away from the Representatives of the American people upon the floor of this House, who are charged with the enactment of the laws, and charged with the expenditure of the public funds, and charged with the responsibilities that rest upon them for the exercise of which they must go back to the people and be held responsible by them for whatsoever they do here? [Applause.]

Shall we have the purpose and intention of the people, expressed through their Representatives, carried out, or is it more dangerous to take away from the people, through their Representatives assembled on the floor of this House, that power and vest it in any department? I prefer to trust the people and put the responsibility on the Representatives of the people, and when they speak and enact laws and put them upon the statute book and appropriate the money to carry out the execution of those laws the money should be expended for that purpose and the Representatives be held responsible who vote the appropriation.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MOON. It is not a question of trusting the Representatives of the people or trusting the department. The department is as much a representative of the people as we are. The point is this, that if you are going to leave the law on the subject as it now stands and then make these changes here, you will have to repeal the whole law to destroy the power of the Postmaster General over the control of the rural routes, because this section does not affect that in any way. It only affects the carrier. He has the power now. You are not attempting to take away from him the power to control the routes. If you want to tie the hands of the Postmaster General completely and prevent anything being done except to increase the pay of the carriers before every election comes along——

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Oh, we are not doing that——

Mr. MOON. You have got to do this: Not only take away from him all the power he has over rural carriers but over rural routes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Nobody wants to take away from the Postmaster General the power he has over his department or any part of it. No one on the floor of this House would do that. I have the greatest admiration and very highest regard for the Postmaster General. He is my strong personal friend, and I am his friend and he knows I am. I have known him many years, served here in this House with him, and I have the greatest confidence in his honesty and in his integrity and in the purity of his purposes and actions, so far as that is concerned, and he is giving the country a great business administration, for all of which I heartily commend him.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I ask leave to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. BARKLEY. Perhaps the gentleman can throw a little light on this language.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds, I will ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and upon the section close in 20 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield five minutes to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close at the expiration of 20 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. FINLEY. I suggest that the gentleman make it 25 or 30 minutes. There are several gentlemen who wish to be heard.

Mr. MOON. I have no objection to giving Members all the time they want. If they want 30 minutes, let them say so; but the time for debate on this proposition has already expired under the rule. I am just proposing to extend it. If Members want 30 minutes, all right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I should like five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOON. That the debate be extended 30 minutes on this section and amendments thereto, and that the Chair control the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I have an amendment or so that I want to offer, in addition to this amendment which is now pending. If the 30 minutes are exhausted in debate on this amendment, then there will be no debate on other amendments. If you limit the time only on this amendment, I have no objection.

Mr. MOON. I do not suppose you want 30 minutes on this amendment?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. No.

Mr. MOON. It is 20 minutes after 1 o'clock, and I will amend my request so as to require a vote on amendments to this section at 2 o'clock. That will give all the friends of the rural-route carriers a chance.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee state his request again?

Mr. MOON. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close at 2 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close at 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Let the Chair control the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will control the time. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to propound a question to the gentleman from Mississippi. The language of this section as it now stands reads as follows:

That on and after July 1, 1915, the compensation of each rural letter carrier for serving a standard route of 24 miles and over, six days in the week, shall be $1,200 per annum.

Under the amendment as proposed it would read as follows:

That on and after July 1, 1915, the compensation of rural letter carriers for serving a standard route of 24 miles and over, six days in the week, shall be $1,200 per annum.

I should like to know what is the difference in the meaning and what change is made by striking out the word "each" and making the word "carrier" plural instead of singular. If the gentleman can throw some light on that, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. As was stated by the gentleman who offered the amendment, and also as stated by the chairman of the committee himself, the purpose and effect of it would be to permit the continuance of present conditions and the enforcement of such other rules and regulations as might be adopted in the future to fix the salaries of rural carriers.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am frank to say that I can not see where the striking out of the word "each" and the making of the word "carrier" plural gives any discretion to anybody.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. We did not see the change in the old language when we put it in the last bill, in the identical language in which it was the year before, but still by rules and regulations the effect of that language as before construed was nullified and the purpose of Congress was not carried out. These gentlemen who stand behind the scenes, and who know what is occurring, and who have the information from the Post Office Department which we do not have, information which is given in the hearings before the committee, know the force and effect of the language which they offer on the floor of this House, or they would not be offering it. And as I stated a moment ago, the gentleman who offered the amendment stated that that was the purpose and object of it, and the chairman of the committee said the same thing. Hence he believes, and the committee believes, that it will have that effect.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman's own construction of his amendment be true, then the compensation of rural letter carriers for standard routes of 24 miles and over would not be $1,200 per annum.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It might not be, under the rules and regulations adopted by the Post Office Department, and we know it is not now under existing rules and regulations.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand. That is the construction the gentleman from Indiana places on his own amendment.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Yes. Under this language as it stands in the bill, with probably one amendment, there would be no question and no doubt in the world but what each and every rural-delivery carrier in the United States who travels 24 miles or more would get the $1,200. Therefore it is better to make it specific and definite, so there will be no doubt about it, than to put in words that would destroy the specific and definite purpose that we desire to express.

There is another thing I want to call your attention to, and that is the word "standard." If you leave the word "standard" in here, in my judgment the Post Office Department may prescribe what is a standard route of 24 miles by saying that a standard route of 24 miles shall consist of a route where the carrier travels 24 miles and carries so much weight and so many pieces of mail and takes so much time to do it. Hence I say that the word "standard" ought to be stricken out, and instead of saying "standard" route say "rural" route of 24 miles in length, in order that we may ourselves define a "standard route," and not leave it to the construction of some officer to whom the power of execution is delegated. Therefore I protest against the pending amendment, and hope you will vote it down. I will offer an amendment later to strike out the word "standard" and insert the word "rural," in line 10, page 52, and if that amendment is adopted, then the bill will read "the compensation of each rural letter carrier for serving a rural route of 24 miles and over, six days in the week, shall be $1,200 per annum, payable monthly." That will make it definite and specific and relieve it of every doubt. Let us vote down this amendment, and then strike out "standard" and insert "rural," and the carriers will then receive $1,200 beyond question, as there will be left no occasion for construction or adoption of rules and regulations for it will be the law beyond a doubt. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "standard" in line 10, page 52.

Mr. COX. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in that connection I desire to say that under the present law carriers who deliver the mail about the cities are paid $100 a month. These carriers not only do not furnish their own transportation but instead have it furnished for them at the expense of the Government. We see the carriers going about the cities with automobiles and with horses and wagons furnished them by the Government. Not only do we see that, but we see carriers in the cities furnished with street-car tickets when on their rounds collecting and delivering the mail in cities.

But when it comes to the rural service, the carriers are paid less than the city carriers and are required, on long routes, to keep two or three horses; and, in addition to that, are required to furnish their own wagons. In my judgment, it is a matter which resolves itself down to the fact that the city carriers are either paid too much or the rural carriers are paid too little. I do not say that the city carriers are paid too much, because the question arises in these times of the high cost of living whether or not a man can support his family upon less than $100 a month. Consequently, I have no fight to make on that proposition, but I do insist, and I think my position is right beyond all sort of question, that the rural carrier who receives $1,100 for the 20 or 25 mile route, and that route extending over muddy roads, where he has to change horses every other day, is not sufficiently compensated for it.

I wish to strike out the word "standard" so there can be no sort of question as to what the right of the carrier will be, so that a Postmaster General or nobody else can juggle with that word "standard" and decide that it means that he can fix the salary for the route notwithstanding.

I want to commit myself unquestionably to the policy of paying these rural-route carriers more, because they have to furnish their horses and wagons. I believe it ought to be done and I believe it will be done. [Applause.]

I, for one, shall always be found endeavoring to preserve the efficiency of the rural service.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall only detain the committee a moment. I usually rely on the committee and vote with the committee, and I intend to do so in the future; but to strike out the word "each" will again put this rural-carrier salary matter into the House to be battled hither and thither as a political football, and no one wants to do that. I think $1,200 is enough for a rural carrier—all he ought to get—that he ought to get that, and that we ought to stop right there. So long as you leave any question or doubt as to what the department is going to give them, we will have this trouble every time that the appropriation bill comes up. A year ago Congress, at the end of a long debate, intended to give the rural carriers $100 a month. They are not all getting it. By the construction placed there by the Post Office Department they have not got it. As the bill is written, and as I understand it, the proposition in the Post Office appropriation bill as it now stands in the bill gives them that. Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] moves to strike out the word "each" and throw it again into doubt. I do not think it is good policy; I do not think it is good economy; I do not think it is what the bulk of this House, on both sides of the aisle, desires to do. I believe the great majority of both the Democrats and the Republicans believe that $1,200 a year is not giving too much pay to the rural-carrier service. I believe that they will practically all vote for it when they understand it. They voted for it a year ago, and they will vote for it now. In conversation a moment ago with a member of the committee he said, "If you strike out the word 'each' you will give the Postmaster General the authority to reconstrue it and to give what he thinks they ought to have." Now, I do not reflect on the Postmaster General. I am more fond of him than of any other Democratic departmental official. I think he is making good; I think he will go down in history as one of the greatest Postmasters General we ever had. I think this is the only fly in the ointment in his administration—that he wants to keep tinkering and tampering with this service—and I do not think Congress is in sympathy with him. I think any time when we can have a square-toed vote, where Members understand the situation, they will vote to give the carriers this amount.

It is the most appreciated service of any Government service. It is the one service that really reaches the rural community.

Of course the Postmaster General is making good. Of course he is trying to save money; but the people do not want him to stint or even run the risk by stinting of crippling this service.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but I do not know of any service that reaches so great a body of the people as the Rural Free Delivery Service. There seems to be an effort here—and I do not know that anyone is opposed to the system at all to largely cripple this feature of the Postal Service—and there has been a hue and cry raised here to economize along this line.

Now, I think that might be false economy. I do not think the Post Office Department should be put on a paying basis if thereby you are impairing the service in that department. The Army and the Navy are not self-sustaining propositions. We spend about $250,000,000 for the maintenance of a great Army and a great Navy, and if the times portend anything—if certain militarists have their way—we may double that amount in the near future. Nobody contends that the Army or the Navy should be put on a self-sustaining basis. The courts of the country are not a self-sustaining proposition. The Federal courts are not a self-sustaining proposition, and neither are the circuit courts of our respective States self-sustaining propositions.

But we hear it everywhere said that we can save a few million dollars a year by abolishing the rural free delivery as it now obtains if we place the same upon a contract basis. The people do not want the Post Office Department put on a contract basis again; they do not want the old star route to be once more brought into vogue, or the rural mail service either overturned or impaired. If the rural people see one thing more than another in the way of the Government coming to their immediate relief, it is the fact that the rural free delivery route reaches into every nook and corner of the Government where it has been inaugurated. To them that is something visible, to them that is something tangible. They can take that and seize upon it and appreciate it. They get their mail every day, and they can send to the town or the city and exchange the products of their farm for the goods they may buy from the merchants. I know that the Post Office Department down here is a friend of the rural carrier, and, with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], we are all very fond of the Postmaster General. I do know that he would not destroy the rural route service of the country nor lessen its efficiency, nor do I believe that any Member on this floor would overturn and subvert that great system, but if you want to raise a protest, so to speak, with the great rural population of this country, then abolish the great service they now have and put the same on a contract basis. We hear no contention made that the letter carriers of the city should be placed on a contract basis. Why make a discrimination between the rural-route carrier and the city carrier, who has no investment, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] a moment ago demonstrated?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman knows that there is not anything at all in this bill that proposes to put the rural-route carrier service on a contract basis.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. There is this experimental scheme.

Mr. COX. Oh, no. That went out on a point of order made by the chairman of this committee.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It went out on a point of order, but the chairman of the committee discussed it a while ago.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I know it went out on a point of order, but I will say this, that the proponents of this bill, the members of that committee, are largely in favor of subverting and overturning the present system and putting the same on a contract basis. I believe that was recommended by the Postmaster General, for whom I have the highest regard.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not true that within less than an hour it has been urged by the chairman of the committee that if we do not adopt this amendment the Postmaster General will exercise his authority under the law and put at least half of these routes on the contract system?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. My colleague is correct in the main, as I understand it. I heard the statement of the chairman a few moments ago. Mr. Chairman, it seems that whenever a little money dribbles out into the great rural communities of the country, and the country boys pick up a few extra sheckles here and there, we then begin at once to want to economize, but we hear nothing about the other contractors and the other officeholders, whose sums in the way of compensation are fabulous as compared to that of the rural carrier. We do not raise our voice in protest against those things at all, but we say that because, forsooth, two or three or maybe five million dollars of money may be saved which now goes to the rural carriers it should be done, although we may impair the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to take issue with the great committee which reported this bill or with any member of that committee.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman is not taking issue with the committee. We put it in.

Mr. RUCKER. I know they are sincere in their purpose and have as much interest in the general welfare of the country as those of us who differ from them in some respects. Referring now to the suggestion just made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] in respect to the statement made by a member of the committee a few moments ago to the effect that unless the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], one of the members of the committee, should be adopted, thereby giving certain wanted latitude, license, power, or privilege to the department, that the department would perhaps exercise the power conferred on it by law to annihilate the Rural Delivery Service, all I have to say is that the assertion is astounding. The Postmaster General is a gentleman for whom we all entertain the highest regard; was recently one of our colleagues here, trusted and followed; and as Postmaster General has no vestige of power except that given to him by Congress, unless it is obtained or taken by usurpation. I can not believe and I will not give credence to the threat implied in the language of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that the Postmaster General of this great Republic would so far forget his duty to the American people as to become vexed and piqued because the Representatives of the people see fit to do certain things, and that, therefore, in retaliation for that which he thinks we ought not to have done, he will blast the hopes, aspirations, and happiness of hundreds of thousands of American citizens. I do not believe he will do it. I say to you it sounds the death knell of Democratic Postmasters General whenever he puts the ax to the roots of the rural delivery tree in this country. [Applause.]

The people pay the expense, the people demand this service, and I tell you the time will come when every man, if he does not know it now, will know that the people are mighty and that in the end they must and will prevail. This Congress sought a year or more ago, whether rightfully or wrongfully, whether wisely or unwisely, to fix the compensation of rural carriers at twelve hundred dollars for every route of 24 miles or more, but by some combination of figures and facts, in some cases where the pay had been eleven hundred dollars, it was increased, not $100, as Congress provided, but $4 a year, and in one case $1 a year. Gentlemen, it will not do. Every time this question comes up gentlemen talk about economizing in the Postal Service, which affects the great body of the American people. Grant that we can save some money, grant that it would be more economical in this country to have the farmer cease following his plow and wend his way to the post office somewhere to obtain his mail. The people in the country are entitled to this service as much as the people in the great cities are entitled to it, and I am making no warfare on those who live in the cities. Is the salary at twelve hundred dollars too much? Who says it is? I grant that it is unequal. I readily concede that if twelve hundred dollars is an adequate and fair compensation to the man who carries 25 pounds, then twelve hundred dollars would be wholly inadequate compensation for the man who carries daily, or even some days, 7,000 pounds, as the distinguished member of this committee said, though I am quite sure that he was mistaken.

Mr. COX. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was not.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman is certain about that, the query in my mind is why some enterprising man does not establish a railroad to haul this immense traffic around.

Mr. COX. If I am mistaken about it, my mistake originated in the Post Office Department, because that is the result of their investigation.

Mr. RUCKER. I heard a gentleman yesterday read some figures that looked like somebody in the Post Office Department had made a mistake.

Mr. COX. I have in my hand a tabulated statement of 500 or 1,000 post offices.

Mr. RUCKER. I concede that. But will anybody say that $1,200 is adequate compensation to pay for the service of carrying the mail on a 24-mile route, where he must sometimes carry 7,000 pounds a day, enough freight to make three good two-horse wagonloads?

Mr. COX. No; it is not; he gets more.

Mr. RUCKER. The time will come when such a case must be taken care of and he must be paid more. Now, the question is, Is $1,200 too much for an average route? I say no.

Mr. FOWLER. So say I.

Mr. RUCKER. I am not here pleading for the rural carrier as an officeholder. I am not here pleading for him or pleading his necessities. I am here talking about him from the plain, common-sense standpoint of fair, even-handed justice between man and man. What must he do? Why, in the towns where the mail trains arrive early in the morning he must leave at 7 or 7.30, and in towns where the mails come at 10 o'clock he must leave at 10.30 or 11 o'clock. In communities where the mail on through trains reach the distributing point at noontime he must go at 1 o'clock. He must perform his work in the forenoon, he must perform it in the afternoon, and whether it is sunshine or rain, whether he is pierced by the cold blasts of winter or caressed by the balmy breezes of springtime, he must go, day after day. This last week, in visiting some of my friends in West Virginia, I daily saw a rural-route carrier wending his way over those mountain roads at 11 o'clock in the morning, just leaving town, with snow a foot and a half deep and the temperature below zero. He must perform that service and return to his home by nighttime.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I desire to say to the gentleman, in my town he would have to come at 7.30, and if the mail did not get in on time he would have to stay until 11.

Mr. RUCKER. Or later.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say there are two amendments to be put. Is it the wish of the committee to have the first amendment put now or to have both put at the conclusion of general debate? The amendments are not necessarily related to each other.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can not we have the amendments read again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Has every one spoken who desires to do so? Has general debate been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. MONDELL. Is debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. No; under agreement debate on this paragraph runs until 2 o'clock.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. That will give three five-minute speeches. If members of the committee claim recognition for those three speeches, of course the Chair will have to recognize them as against other Members. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think I am as much in favor of justice to men who have to work for a living as any man on this floor. I want to see justice done to every rural letter carrier. I think, however, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana is a reasonable amendment and will do no injustice to any man in the rural service. Now, let us look for a moment and see whether or not they are compensated as they ought to be. The men who carry the mails in the cities of the country as a rule are required to serve as long as three years as substitutes. During their substitute service they are required to report every morning at the post office for duty, and in the large cities, like Chicago, they are required to pay their fare back and forth, and the average earning power of a letter carrier during his three years' substitute service amounts to $30 per month. At the end of his substitute service he goes into the regular service at $800 a year. He works himself up to $900, $1,000, to $1,100, and finally to $1,200. It takes him nine years of service before he reaches the $1,200 grade. It is true that he does not have to furnish equipment to carry the mails, but it is also true that the men who carry the mails on their backs in the great cities carry as much as 50 to 60 pounds of first-class mail in a single delivery and at the same time carry anywhere from 5 to 25 packages of parcel post. There is complaint about this overloading of the men. Whether the complaint is just or not I am not prepared to say, but I think it only fair to say to the men who are engaged in the Postal Service of the country, whether it be city or country, that the Postmaster General ought to have some discretionary power. If you take away the discretionary power of the Postmaster General he is a figurehead; he is a stalking horse; and any letter carrier can tell the Postmaster General what his duty is, and he has no power to resent a statement made by a letter carrier. Now, it seems to me that there ought to be power somewhere to regulate. Let us see what the rules of the Department are to-day as to the rural carrier. Under the present rules of the department a man who carries a 24-mile route as a rural carrier gets $1,200 a year. If he carries a certain weight of mail, regardless of the length of the route—whether it is 4 miles or 24 miles—he gets $1,200 a year.

If his route requires him to work eight hours a day, regardless of the length of the route or weight of the mail he carries, he gets $1,200 a year; and if he carries on a route of more than 24 miles, regardless of the weight of the mail, he gets $12 per mile per annum for every extra mile over 24 miles. Those are the rules laid down by the department. Can anyone say that they are unjust or unreasonable? Ought anyone to say that the Postmaster General of a great country like this, charged with the responsibility of conducting a department that spends one-third of all the revenue of the Government of the United States, should have his hands so tied that a rural letter carrier or a city carrier can tell him what his business is? For one, I do not believe he should.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I will take just a moment of the time.

On March 6, 1914, a bill which had passed this and the other legislative body was approved, giving, as this body understood, and as the other body understood, and as the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill understood, $1,200 to those rural carriers having 24-mile routes throughout the United States. A construction was placed upon that law absolutely adverse to that understanding by the Postmaster General. And this House, in order to make itself plain and understood and to instruct the Postmaster General, later, on the 6th day of August, 1914, expressed itself in the passage of a bill which placed a construction upon the original law which had been passed and approved. That bill evidently came to the notice of the Postmaster General, but he has insisted in refusing to accept the construction of the two bodies that passed this law, and now is asking, through the pending amendment, to have his discretion extended so that he may again place an unfavorable construction on what is believed by a large majority on both sides of this House to be just and fair. That is a regulation providing that the rural carriers having 24 miles or more on their routes should have $1,200 per year. And I think instead of amending this so as to extend and continue that discretion, which has been used and operated against the carriers of the United States, we should make it so definite and certain, as it is in this bill, that neither the Postmaster General nor anyone else shall have any right or opportunity to misconstrue it through any discretion that we may see fit to grant him here. In this, our third effort, the Postmaster General should be able to catch our drift. It should be the purpose of administrative officers to execute the law as intended and expressed by the Congress rather than along lines of departmental policy or wish.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] moves to strike out, in line 9, page 52, the word "each" and to add to the word "carrier" in that line the letter "s," thereby amending this section. Although not clearly shown upon its face, it would vest in the Postmaster General similar powers which he has heretofore exercised. I have the greatest respect for the Postmaster General, and I know that he is endeavoring to make a splendid public official and to put the Post Office Department upon a self-sustaining basis.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has argued that the Postmaster General should be given great latitude in fixing the salaries and arranging details as to the rural letter carriers.

I represent a city district, and of course have no rural letter carriers there, but I also spend a part of the year in the country where we do have rural letter carriers. I am therefore much interested in their proper and fair treatment, because I observed from personal contact the arduous duties which they perform.

I can not see why Congress should not fix definitely the salaries to be received by these public servants. The last session we thought we were fixing their salaries, and we appropriated something like $3,000,000 to pay for this increase. The Postmaster General, however, so construed his powers as to eliminate the extra pay almost totally, and thereby retaining in the Treasury about $3,000,000 which Congress had intended to give to the rural letter carriers as increased pay. The Postmaster General understoood definitely what Congress wanted, but he did not increase their salaries as was contemplated. I am therefore in favor of the bill as it stands, so that the rural letter carriers will know exactly what they are to receive and so that the Postmaster General will know from this bill exactly what Congress intends their salaries to be. Congress defines and fixes the salaries in the various departments of other public officials, and there is no misconstruction as to what it is intended for them to receive, and I can not see why the same definiteness should not be defined in this bill.

Congress is a body which represents the great mass of the people. It is elected every two years. Its Representatives come in direct contact with the people of the country, and should, and do, reflect their views and wishes, and are directly accountable to them for the legislation which it passes. It is therefore clearly the duty of Congress to fix these salaries and not to leave it to the Postmaster General, as has been done.

I am proud of the fact that our Postmaster General has succeeded in placing the department upon a self-sustaining basis, and for this he deserves great credit and the thanks of the people of the land.

I realize that to perform the rural service as we are performing for the people of the country costs about $39,000,000 in excess of what we receive in return in dollars and cents. I look upon the Postal System, however, upon a broad scale. It is the one department of the Government which is dear and close to the people. The expense in serving the mail to those sections of the country sparsely settled will probably not pay for many years to come, if at all, but the revenue received from those sections and cities thickly settled will abundantly provide for the loss in the sparsely settled sections. We should therefore look upon the system as one great, governmental department, and so long as it will make its own expenses and perform its great duty with efficiency and dispatch I am quite sure the people of this country will not only be satisfied but vastly gratified as well.

These rural letter carriers have considerable expense. They are compelled to provide their means of transportation and to deliver the mail each and every day in the year. While in the summer the work may be light and pleasant, in the winter it becomes onerous and very unpleasant. The roads in the greater part of the country where the mail is delivered by the rural carriers are not only bad in winter but often miserable and almost impassable.

I received a letter this morning from a rural carrier in my State, who says that during the summer one horse will perform the work on his route, but that during the winter he is compelled to have two horses to do the same service. There are many routes in the State of Maryland, especially those in the mountainous sections, where more than one horse is required almost constantly.

Mr. RUCKER. Most of them require two.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; most of them require two.

Mr. RUSSELL. And some of them three.

Mr. LINTHICUM. My friend from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] says three. We see, therefore, gentlemen, that the salary provided in this bill is largely taken up by the expense of the maintenance of the equipment necessary in the work.

I will say in conclusion, therefore, that I am heartily in favor of the passage of the bill as it stands, so that Congress will know that the rural carriers are to get the salary which it has fixed. The amounts are definite and certain, just as they should be, and as they are usually in all other departments of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, what I shall say voices the action of the Post Office Committee of the House. There has been some talk here about the committee amendments. The action of the Post Office Committee of the House is contained in section 23, as reported in the bill on pages 52 and 53.

I am not one of those who wish to pay people more for their services to the Government than those services are really worth. I wish to say that when Congress at the last session passed the act that it did, everybody expected that the salary of the carriers on standard routes of 24 miles would be $100 a month, or $1,200 a year. And I will state further in that connection that, roundly speaking, there are a hundred million people in this country, and 25,000,000 of them, comparatively speaking, receive their mail at the hands of the rural carriers. No political party, I care not what the name of it is, will ever uproot this service. If they do, the life of that party will be short.

Now, as to the question of economy. Let us see about that. It has been argued here by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the chairman of the committee, that it is at the expense of $39,000,000, and that you may save that by abolishing the service. Yes. You could save $100,000,000 by abolishing the Navy Department; you could save $100,000,000 and more by abolishing the War Department, and so on; but who wishes to do this? According to the reports of the department, the Postal Service is self-sustaining, and I want to see the man stand up here or stand up anywhere and tell his people that he wishes to make millions and millions of dollars out of the Postal Service for the general benefit of the Treasury of the United States, and that he wishes to use the Postal Service for that purpose. He will receive stay-at-home orders.

I am in favor of such economies as will in the end result in penny postage. That will come some day. It can not come now. Anyone who is conversant, anyone who knows the condition of the highways of this country at present will not vote for this amendment. In my country it has been raining for about six weeks, and the roads that are good ordinarily are almost impassable now, and I have had to go to the department and ask that the time limit be not called on carriers for that reason. Perhaps the work of those men in the summer time is easy and light, but in the winter it is onerous and heavy and burdensome. They do not get too much money.

Now, speaking of the contract system, that is in the air, but it will not be, my friend. It is not in the power of any party in this country to overturn the Rural Free Delivery Service and place it on a contract basis.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It was defeated on the floor of the House in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and voted down by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. FINLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want a minute for explanation, by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MOON. One minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a minute.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and some other gentleman stated, I am informed, that I had said if the word "each" were stricken out we could then go to the contract system. I did not say any such thing. Of course we know that the words of the act do not mean that. If the word "each" is stricken out, it will not restrict the discretion of the Postmaster General as it will be restricted if left in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent for a minute in which to ask a question of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. If any carrier has 7,000 pounds or any other large quantity of freight to deliver, would it not be better, rather than reduce the salaries of all the other carriers, to hire a dray to carry his mail around in that instance?

Mr. MOON. Yes; but that does not apply at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. It applies to all heavy cases.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, what is the status of the bill as to amendments? Are further amendments permissible?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman can send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. MANN. There are two amendments now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. It will be lodged at the desk and may be called up in its order. The Clerk will now report the amendments in their order. First, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Cox:
Page 52, line 9, strike out the word "each," and after the word "carrier" add the letter "s."

The CHAIRMAN. The first part will be considered separately. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana now wish the second part of the amendment put?

Mr. COX. No; I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 10, strike out the word "standard."

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that amendment by striking out the word "standard" and inserting the word "rural."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "standard" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "rural."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute in the nature of an amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Have we agreed to the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 5, after the word "annum," add the following: "And provided further, That no rural letter carrier shall be required to deliver mail on Christmas Day."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. That the act approved May 23, 1910 (ch. 255, 36 R. S., 416, now carried in Postal Laws and Regulations as sec. 931), be amended so as to read as follows: "Whenever the sender shall so request, a receipt shall be taken on the delivery of any registered mail matter showing to whom and when and place where the same was delivered, which receipt shall be returned to the sender, and be received in the courts as prima facie evidence of such delivery."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that section. It is new legislation, not provided for by the rule that was reported by the Committee on Rules the other day.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, this section is the law now, except the words "when and place where," on line 4, page 54. It was not included in the rule making new legislation in order at the request of the department. The department seems not to desire the section now, although they did, probably, in the first instance desire it, and I am glad to see the point of order made against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] asks unanimous consent to address the committee for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Who is it that wants to talk 20 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] wants to address the committee for 20 minutes.

Mr. MOON. I thought I had an arrangement with the gentleman to wait until some other matters were discussed.

Mr. STEENERSON. I prefer to proceed now. This is the end of the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to conclude this matter, anyway, before the gentleman speaks. I want to move to add to the close of this bill——

Mr. STEENERSON. I will suspend for the present. I want to be heard at the conclusion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will be recognized at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, after the words "Navy mail clerks," on line 17, page 53, I offer an amendment as follows: "All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, after line 17, as a separate paragraph, insert the following:
"SEC. 25. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] asks unanimous consent to address the committee for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. I am not going to object, Mr. Chairman, but I thought there was a very positive understanding with the gentleman from Minnesota to the effect that the 20 minutes he was going to take were to come after the 2 minutes I was going to take for myself and the 10 minutes that were to be taken by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. STEENERSON. I am willing to wait until the gentleman does that.

Mr. MOON. There is no objection to the gentleman speaking. It is just a question of the order of speaking.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am perfectly agreeable to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the request, with the understanding that the time to be occupied by the gentleman from Minnesota will be occupied after the other gentlemen conclude

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, can we not finish up this bill?

Mr. MOON. This is a matter that the gentleman will not object to when he understands it. It is a matter that ought to come in the committee, and not in the House, and when the gentleman concludes what he has to say I will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the public service of Senators and Representatives is hardly ever fully appreciated by the people they represent, unless it is possibly the services of that class of Representatives who maintain a press bureau for the advertisement of their official acts. I doubt very much, sir, whether we appreciate the value of the services of our own colleagues until after they go out from among us.

As we are closing this bill, the last one in the making of which certain gentlemen on the Post Office Committee will participate, I feel it is due that I should acknowledge to this House the splendid, unselfish, and patriotic service, the courteous conduct and demeanor at all times, and the aid rendered by the Hon. SAMUEL W. SMITH, of Michigan; the Hon. THOMAS L. REILLY, of Connecticut; the Hon. WILLIAM E. TUTTLE, jr., of New Jersey; the Hon. H. ROBERT FOWLER, of Illinois; and the Hon. FRANK E. WILSON, of New York. [Applause.] During the years they have served upon this committee the chairman has been very much benefited by their advice and counsel, as have the other members of the committee; and as they go out of public life for the present I feel it is due to them that we thus publicly acknowledge their splendid service to the country. I trust that they may come back if they desire or that they may go into other public service if they desire it; because if the people lose the service of these men in some capacity, they lose some of the most faithful public servants who have ever acted in behalf of a great people. [Applause.] We will not forget them, Mr. Chairman, on account of the pleasant social relations we have had with them, nor can we forget them because of the great good that they have done in office. [Applause.]

I now ask unanimous consent that our friend, Mr. REILLY of Connecticut, may address the House for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] may address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, while not long on "fare thee wells," while realizing that there is plenty in this busy House to do without taking up its time with swan songs, while knowing that Members who are to remain and are to come are of more importance than those who are to go, yet I can not permit this occasion, the passing of this great supply bill, to go by without a word or two of a somewhat personal nature and yet in a way related to this legislation.

This is the last Post Office appropriation bill in the adoption of which I will take any part, for two years at least [laughter], because of a recent decision of what I think was a temporarily misled constituency [laughter], yet a constituency which I respect; yes, love—a constituency of which any Member of this splendid body, even those of far greater fame than I, might well be proud.

It is a real honor to be a Member of this House. It is high honor to be a Member for even a day; it is a higher honor to be a Member for a term, and higher still to be sent here year after year as many men on both sides of the aisle are sent. It is high honor, indeed, to be associated with the membership of this House for any length of time—a membership as high class, as honorable, as patriotic as any similar body in the world. Did I say similar body? Then change that, for there is no similar body. The American House of Representatives is in a class by itself. It is composed of men selected from the flower of the citizenry of the greatest nation God in His wisdom ever made. Able, honorable, and true, devoted to their country, their duty, and their friends, fortunate is the man who can address them as "My colleagues."

Among the great committees of this great legislative body stands the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of which for nearly four years I have been a member. This committee has to do with the greatest service in the world—the Postal Service. It is closer to the Nation, the State, the city, the family, than any other. Without this service business would be paralyzed; without it modern society could not exist. Yes, indeed, it is worth while to be associated in any way with this wonderful organization, so truly and effectively described on the front of the beautiful new Post Office Building yonder by the station.

Enlarger of the common life.
Carrier of news and knowledge.
Instrument of trade and industry.

Messenger of sympathy and love.
Servant of parted friends.
Consoler of the lonely.
Bond of the scattered family.

[Applause.]

This service carries the largest appropriation—nearly $322,000,000—made by this Government, and it is a source of great satisfaction to know that it has been placed on a self-sustaining basis. Yet if it were not, it would be worth all it costs. That it has been placed on the high plane of efficiency it occupies is due in great part to the personnel, from the Postmaster General to the special-delivery messenger boy.

It is therefore a source of keenest satisfaction to know that we have had some share in making that great army of faithful postal employees more contented and happy and thereby more devoted to duty, for the contented man, the one who feels that he is getting a square deal, is the efficient and devoted man. The most prosperous business concern or corporation is the one with satisfied help; the most successful government is the one with a contented constituency. Fair treatment and good wages make for loyalty, and a loyal corps of employees in every branch of the public service is the best asset this country can have.

It has been a pleasure and honor to have had something to do with the establishment of the parcel post and the postal savings bank. It is still greater pleasure and honor to realize that we also have had something to do with the improvement of the working conditions of the vital force, the bone and sinew of the Postal Service—the rank and file of the employees. If we had done no other thing than to have helped lighten the burdens of the men and women who toil for their daily bread in the service of the Government and to improve their condition in life, the time has been well spent. I hope you will bear with me for a few minutes more to draw your attention to some of the commendable things that the Sixty-second Congress and Sixty-third Congress have done for these employees, and to urge my friends on both sides of the House who will be Members of the next Congress to guard them with care.

The eight-hour law for post-office clerks and letter carriers, the 8 hours to be confined to a period of not more than 10 consecutive hours, is, to my mind, one of the most beneficial pieces of legislation enacted by the Congress in recent years. Prior to the enactment of the eight-hour law, post-office clerks could be required to work any number of hours in any day and were not paid for any overtime, as there was no limit placed on their day's work. The letter carriers were working under what was known as a 48-hour law, but it gave no protection whatever to the men. Their schedules ranged over periods varying from 10 to 18 hours each day, and even when they were required to work more than 48 hours in a week they were not paid for overtime. No consideration whatever was shown to the carriers, and the result was that the complaints became so numerous that the eight-hour-in-ten law was passed by Congress to remedy the unsatisfactory conditions surrounding the postal employees.

The law which grants compensatory time to employees for services performed on Sundays, to be given on one of the six days following the Sunday on which work is performed, was another piece of legislation that was of great benefit to the Postal Service as well as to the postal employees. It has been changed in this bill so that for the Sunday work in December, or during the rush of the holiday season, the compensatory time may be given during the succeeding January.

The pay of substitute employees in the Postal Service was raised to 35 cents an hour for vacation and auxiliary work and 40 cents an hour when substitutes were working in the places of regular employees off duty without pay. This legislation was also of material benefit to the service, as it gave the substitutes an opportunity to make sufficient income to keep them in the service until they secured positions as regular employees. Prior to the enactment of the legislation which increased the hourly pay of substitutes these employees did not make sufficient money to pay their living expenses, and a large percentage of them resigned from the service each year in order to accept employment where the income and future prospects were brighter than in the Postal Service.

The antigag law which was passed by the Sixty-second Congress gave the postal employees the rights of which they had been deprived by Executive orders. Prior to the enactment of the antigag law an employee had no redress for any grievance other than reporting it to the official who was actually responsible for the cause of complaint. If an employee wrote to his Member of Congress and it became known to the postal officials it would be cause for his removal from the service. The antigag law not only restores postal employees to all the rights and privileges of which they had been deprived by Executive orders, but it also protects them in their positions by requiring that they be furnished with a copy of all charges that might be preferred against them, and they are given an opportunity to submit their defense in writing.

The law which reclassifies and regulates the salaries of the railway mail clerks is also a piece of constructive legislation that will stand to the credit of the Sixty-third Congress. Many necessary reforms have been brought about in the Railway Mail Service which at the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress was in a chaotic state on account of the discontent among the employees, which was brought about through the so-called reforms of a former administration of the Post Office Department.

The rural letter carriers have had their salaries increased in the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses by the enactment of legislation which was of great benefit to the Rural Delivery Service and the rural letter carriers. The pay of many rural carriers has never been commensurate with the work they perform and the outlay in furnishing proper vehicles for the delivery and collection of the mail in rural communities. I trust it will not be long before a law will be passed that will grant the rural letter carriers an annual allowance for horse hire.

The enactment of the law passed by the Sixty-third Congress which grants compensation to postal employees who are injured in the performance of their duties or to the relatives of employees who lose their lives is in keeping with the spirit of the times.

In looking back over the work of the past four years it is a source of great satisfaction to me to know that one has played some small part in trying to bring about the reforms above mentioned. My only regret is that through force of circumstances I will have to lay aside this work which has been so pleasing because of the improvements that were being brought about in the Postal Service and of the benefit that they have been to the working force of that service. For the distinguished and able chairman and members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I have grown to have not only great respect and admiration for the patriotic spirit shown by them when considering all the questions submitted to the Post Office Committee, but I also have a feeling of warm affection for each of them, on account of the noble and manly qualities of which I have learned while being associated with them.

My colleagues, Democratic, Republican, and Progressive, I bid you Godspeed, and give to you out of a full heart my best wishes in all your hopes and ambitions. While I can not be with you to take part in the activities of legislative life, my thoughts for your well-being will always be with you. The friendships formed here will never, I trust, be broken. May I be permitted to say, now and in the years to come, with the writer of these sweet lines:

Friends, though scarce, we sometimes find,
Whose hearts are always true and warm,
Who, like the ivy 'round the tree,
Cling closest in the raging storm.
Should sorrow e'er thy beauty sear,
Such friendship still I'll feel for thee;
And when thou think'st of friend sincere
I trust you will remember me.

[Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing, the time of Mr. REILLY of Connecticut having expired, at the request of Mr. MOON and Mr. MADDEN leave was given him to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have already pointed out that the war in Europe has been put forth by the present administration as the justification for the withholding of needed mail facilities in rural districts and for the proposal to reduce expenses by substituting a contract service for the present Rural-Delivery Service, and also for the advancement of the new policy of making the Postal Service contribute to the general support of the Government. The claim is that the war has shut off imports, and thereby reduced customs revenues. President Wilson, in his address to Congress on September 4, asking for the war-revenue law, used this language:

> During the month of August there was, as compared with the corresponding month of last year, a falling off of $10,629,538 in the revenues collected from customs. A continuation of this decrease in the same proportion throughout the current fiscal year would probably mean a loss of customs revenues of from sixty to one hundred millions. I need not tell you to what this falling off is due. It is due in chief part not to the reductions recently made in the customs duties, but to the great decrease in importations, and that is due to the extraordinary extent of the industrial area affected by the present war in Europe.

This statement—that there is a decrease in importations—has been repeated during the debate on this bill on this floor and is found in the official communications of the Post Office Department to Congress.

I want to call attention to the fact that the President compares the falling off in revenue under the Underwood law with the receipts under the Payne law. Of course he overlooks the slight difference in the rates of duty. He should have remembered that his party, and especially he as the candidate, promised the people a downward revision, and that they gave us a downward revision, and that therefore, unless the importations were very largely increased, necessarily the receipts from customs would be diminished. In his campaign letter to Mr. UNDERWOOD a month later he went still further and said that it was the war, and nothing but war, that caused the falling off in revenues from customs receipts. Now, what are the facts? The official figures are now before us. They were not fully before us at the time of the discussion of the war-revenue bill.

I hold in my hand a document issued by the Department of Commerce, the Monthly Summary of Commerce and Finance of the United States.

The October number has recently been issued; we have not yet got the November or the December number. On the first page containing the tables we find the following total imports of merchandise for October, 1913, $132,149,302. For October, 1912, $138,880,850, an increase for one month of about $6,000,000. I find in the column 10 months ending October, 1914, the total imports of merchandise were $1,548,531,394. For the same 10 months of 1913, $1,460,364,000, or $88,196,921 more during the first 10 months of calendar year 1914 than for the corresponding period the year before.

These 10 months I call to your attention were the first 10 months that the Underwood law was in effect. It was not in full effect until the 1st of March. It took effect as to wool in January. So you see that instead of there being a falling off in imports there has been an increase in imports of over eighty millions in 10 months. I have the figures which I got by telephone from the Department of Commerce as to the receipts and imports for November, the month just past. I find that the total imports of merchandise for the last month, November, 1914, $126,467,907, and the duties from customs $16,924,408.

Now, if we had a similar amount of importations for December, and they will be much larger from the preliminary figures I have received, there will be $252,935,814, or in round numbers additional two hundred and fifty-three millions for the two months completing the calendar year of 1914, and will make the total imports of merchandise for the 12 months $1,801,531,394, as against $1,793,138,480 for calendar year 1913, or $8,392,914 more for 1914 than 1913.

Where, then, is the contention that the war in Europe has diminished the imports? The contention is simply a fallacy and not true. You may excuse a man in the excitement of a campaign for exaggeration; you can excuse a candidate for telling a whopper just before election; but now that the campaign is over and the official records are available it seems to me that you ought to cease repeating the statement and come back to facts.

Now, as a ground for explaining the embarrassed condition of the Treasury and the deficit, the conclusion has been drawn that the revenues from customs were disappointing to the Democrats. There never was a greater fallacy. How much revenue did you expect from the Underwood law? You have got within a small fraction of what was predicted for it. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 30, 1913, page 5233, from

Mr. UNDERWOOD's final speech on the conference report. He said:

The income tax, leaving out those features that relate to the tax on corporations, will produce above $83,000,000. The corporation part of the income tax included in the bill, it is estimated, will produce $39,000,000. The customs taxes for the year 1915 are estimated to produce $249,000,000.

Taking the other sources of revenue that the Government now has and adding to them the income tax and the customs laws that are affected by this bill, it will produce for the fiscal year 1915, according to our estimates, $1,026,000,000; and if the expenditures of the Government do not exceed $1,008,000,000, which is the estimate that will cover the expenditures of the Government for that year, the bill will produce a surplus revenue of $18,000,000, which the committee considers as a safe balance on the right side of the ledger.

Mr. UNDERWOOD says that in the fiscal year it will produce $249,000,000. Well, the Payne bill produced $318,000,000, so there was expected to be a decline. When you passed the Underwood law you expected there would be $249,000,000 revenue instead of $311,257,348, which was the amount collected in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912, so that you can not lay that to the war. You are not disappointed as to the income produced by the Underwood law, because you expected it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So, putting the total customs duties collected for the first 10 months of 1914, as given in the October summary, of $209,000,000, and adding $16,924,408, customs receipts for last month, and a similar amount for this month, you will have $243,418,045, only $5,581,955 less than Mr. UNDERWOOD's estimate, or practically the same as his estimate.

If you calculate that December will produce only as much as November, then the difference would certainly not be in excess of $6,000,000 less than the estimate of Mr. UNDERWOOD at the time he spoke on the conference report.

Now, then, what justification have you, what justification did the President have, for blaming the war in Europe for the lower customs revenue when you are getting the revenue that you expected? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Where is the Democratic blunder that has brought embarrassment upon us which necessitates the recommendation of destroying the rural service and bleeding the Postal Service to support the Government? The blunder consisted not in misfiguring the income from tariff but from other sources. These are official figures, and you all can find them in Monthly Summary for the months referred to. I will insert the page from the October, 1914, Summary, where it gives the imports for the first 10 months of the calendar year 1914 and also the ad valorem rate on dutiable and on all imports for the respective periods. The rate for 1912, under the Payne law, was 39.54 per cent on dutiable and 18.30 per cent on total imports, and about the same for 1913, while in the 10 months of 1914 the rate under the new law was only 35.02 per cent on dutiable and 13.53 per cent on total imports. For October, 1914, the rate on total imports was only 11.78 per cent.

The blunder was in the income tax. You fell short $51,000,000, the difference between $122,000,000, which you estimated you would get from the corporation and income tax, and the $71,386,156 which you actually got from that source. You fell short more than $51,000,000, and that is the chief element which causes embarrassment in the Treasury. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means estimated that your appropriations would be $1,008,000,000. That was for the fiscal year 1915—the current year. What were they? I have the Book of Estimates, issued by the Treasury Department, and there is no guesswork about this. The total appropriations for the fiscal year 1915 were $1,094,168,102.38. He estimated that you were going to appropriate $1,008,000,000, and you appropriated $86,000,000 more than you said you would. There was another blunder. The appropriation of $1,094,168,102.38 for the fiscal year 1915, instead of $1,008,000,000, as you said you proposed to appropriate, and the falling short of the income tax and the corporation tax in the sum of $51,000,000 is the cause of your trouble. What would have been the result if you had had the Payne rates? It has been demonstrated to a mathematical certainty. The rate under the Underwood law, applied to the free and dutiable goods together, was 13.53 per cent, a little over 13½ per cent, for the first 10 months of the calendar year 1914, but only 11.78 per cent for October. This is also given in this same publication issued by the Department of Commerce for the very period in question. Under the Payne law the rate was 18.34 per cent for 1913. How could you expect to get as much money when you collected only 13½ per cent ad valorem on the total amount of importations, instead of 18½ per cent? It seems to me it is entirely unjustifiable to expect anything of that kind. If you apply—and this is relevant because of the address of the President on September 4—the Payne duties, you would have had, according to my calculation—and you can calculate it yourself—about eighty-six or eighty-seven million dollars more of customs revenue on the same importations that actually came in than you obtained. It could not be a surprise to a sane man that you got less on substantially the same amount of imports under a lower than a higher rate. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] estimated the falling off of revenue very closely. He can not be surprised or disappointed, for he predicted the result very closely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. So that the cause of all of this trouble in the Treasury, this falling off of the available balance from $144,000,000 to a little over $66,000,000, as it is to-day—the excess of expenditures over receipts which we are now experiencing—is directly due to the decrease of customs receipts under Democratic tariff legislation, and not to accident, not to war. It is due to miscalculation as to the amount of income to be derived from the income and the corporation tax, and to the large—I will not say extravagant—appropriations—$86,000,000 more than you officially estimated you would appropriate. Therefore, it seems to me, it is about time that the leaders of the Democratic Party should acknowledge the truth. You may as well do it now as later, because sooner or later you will have to acknowledge that these are the facts, that these are the causes for the falling off of income—miscalculation, blunder; not any misfortune because of the war. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is important for the people to know, because the war came along and we can not end it. If our difficulties in the Treasury were due to the war, we would have to submit, and perhaps it would be justifiable to resort to bleeding the postal receipts to support the Government; but, seeing that the cause is not the war in Europe, but is Democratic blundering in legislation, then that is a cause that can be removed. [Applause on Republican side.] And, gentlemen, it will be removed by the people, and you may as well acknowledge that you were mistaken and be honest and candid and fair on this proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES—SUMMARY OF IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

[Figures in all statements for October, 1914, and for 10 months ending October, 1914, subject to revision. Figures of imports for October, 1913, include only entries under the tariff law of 1913, beginning with the fourth day of the month. The entries of the first three days of the month under the law of 1909, amounting to, approximately, $13,665,000, are included with September totals.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a service in this House for 20 years is a long service, and I think I would be neglectful if I did not express on behalf of this side of the House, and I think the whole House, our regret at losing one of the most genial and earnest and honest Members of the House, the ranking Republican on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH]. [Applause.] Modest to a degree, earnest and faithful, he has endeared himself to the hearts of all who knew him here, and wherever he may be in life he carries with him the respect and the best wishes of the Members of the National House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the pending Post Office appropriation bill contains a large amount of legislation, in the main, if not entirely, good reform legislation. The Postmaster General was for many years a Member of this House and received his training in governmental affairs here, and while there is and necessarily will be at different times and from different quarters criticism of the Post Office Department, I am unwilling to let the occasion go by without saying that I think this former Member of this House, Postmaster General Burleson, is handling himself in that office at the head of that great department in a wonderfully satisfactory manner. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be instructed to renumber the sections of the bill so that they may follow in proper numerical order.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now arise and report the bill to the House with the various amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19906, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit with instructions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON moves to recommit the bill H. R. 19906 to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads with instructions to report the same back with the following amendment:

After line 8, on page 5, insert the following:

"For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, 5, at not exceeding $4,000 each; 42 at not exceeding $3,000 each; 10 at not exceeding $2,500 each; 5 at not exceeding $2,000 each; 16 at not exceeding $1,900 each; 45 at not exceeding $1,800 each; 95 at not exceeding $1,700 each; 150 at not exceeding $1,600 each; 180 at not exceeding $1,500 each; 150 at not exceeding $1,400 each; 350 at not exceeding $1,300 each; 560 at not exceeding $1,200 each; 525 at not exceeding $1,100 each; 300 at not exceeding $1,000 each; 130 at not exceeding $900 each; 100 at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $3,200,000.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota demands a division.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-two gentlemen have risen on the demand for the yeas and nays, not a sufficient number.

Mr. MANN and Mr. STEENERSON. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The other side is demanded. Those opposed will rise and stand until counted. Seventy-three gentlemen have risen in the negative——

Mr. MANN. That would give the yeas and nays, and as a matter of convenience, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT OVER NEW YEAR'S DAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before the gentleman makes the point of no quorum I would like to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MANN. I withhold the point of no quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next, so that Members may have their customary New Year's holiday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Alabama have any doubt that the House will work to-morrow if this request is not granted? Some of us think it will. This is about the shortest session we could possibly have.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the House would work to-morrow, but I do not know whether we will have a quorum, and probably will work, but I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina it has been customary always to adjourn over New Year's Day. I think the appropriation bills are in better condition and further advanced now than at any other time. I make this request as a matter of usual custom, and I do not think there is any danger of the House not getting through with the appropriation bills at the present time.

Mr. MANN. It will not advance business by having a meeting to-morrow or on Saturday, even, but will simply discommode a large number of Members, and progress will not be made by it. That side will lose a lot of cooperation on this side——

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is not usual for the House not to reconvene until after the first Monday of the new year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; we have taken less holiday this year than ever before. As far as I am personally concerned, I have no desire in the matter——

Mr. FINLEY. My sole purpose in asking the question was that I had in mind possibly the appropriation bills coming up and general debate could be had, and that would be gotten through with. I shall not object, however.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not get through announcing the result of the demand for the yeas and nays. There are 32 in favor and 73 against, and 32 is a sufficient number.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I made the point of order of no quorum as a convenience to Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 68, nays 150, answered "present" 2, not voting 208, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.
The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.
The question is on the passage of the bill.
The bill was passed.
On motion of Mr. MOON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HENSLEY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for one day, on account of sickness in his family.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of the Southern Claims Commission, No. 13183, George W. Morris, no adverse report having been made thereon.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20150) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and, pending that, I would ask the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] what arrangements we can make, if any, relative to general debate.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What has the gentleman from Texas to suggest?
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have a request for only one hour on this side. I desire to state that it will be occupied by one speech.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will say, Mr. Speaker, an hour on a side will be satisfactory to us.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill H. R. 20150, the Indian appropriation bill, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and the other by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]. Is there objection to this request?
Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the chairman of the committee if he proposes to finish general debate this afternoon and not to go into the five-mniute rule?
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is our desire.
Mr. HARRISON. I may want half an hour. Will the gentleman give me that time?
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I can not do so without extending the time, because I have agreed to let one person have the hour. The gentleman from Mississippi may have the time in case the gentleman to whom I have yielded will divide his time with him. I will state that there had been only one request until you made your request now, and that is why I asked for one hour on this side.
Mr. HARRISON. Can not the gentleman amend his request and make it three hours?
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not think, unless the House sits late to-night, that we can get through.
Mr. HARRISON. Then, I object, Mr. Speaker.
The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 20150, the Indian appropriation bill.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that when the bill is closed we have an hour of general debate on either side?
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I make that request.
Mr. MANN. What is the request?
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The request is that when the bill is closed we have one hour on each side for general debate; that is, after the conclusion of the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule.
Mr. MANN. I object to that. That changes the procedure of the House.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We ask for the reading of the bill then.
Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, H. R. 20150, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20150) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for an hour.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, in order to see if we can arrange for a time for general debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 20150, the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] is recognized.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will make this request, that the general debate be concluded within three hours, one hour to be controlled by myself, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], half an hour by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and half an hour by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the general debate shall be limited to three hours, one hour to be controlled by himself, another hour to be controlled by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], half an hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and half an hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I was going to reserve the right to object. I am not going to object, but I want to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] how late he intends, as chairman of the committee, to sit to-day?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think possibly until 6 o'clock, two hours and a half from now.

Mr. MANN. That will depend.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As long as may be desired. I do not know.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I now move, Mr. Speaker, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20150, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20150, the Indian appropriation bill, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20150) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] if he desires to use some time first?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Not at present.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then I will yield one hour to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to speak on the question of rural credits. I shall confine myself principally to the element of State aid and to the attitude of the present administration toward rural-credit legislation.

In the wide discussion which has been given to rural credits there has developed no disagreement as to the necessity for additional legislation or as to the large measure of benefits which will inure to American agriculture from its enactment. On a former occasion, when I had the honor to address this House on the subject of land mortgage banks, I assumed that there existed a true spirit of cooperation among the friends and advocates of this legislation to perfect a workable bill which could command wide confidence and support; and that the only contention which was present or which could arise was that noble contention or rather emulation of who best can work and best agree. For this reason I did not review the history of the growth and development of these institutions in other lands and among foreign peoples, but confined my remarks to a discussion of concrete propositions which have been advanced by groups of men for the consideration of Congress. I was working under the conviction that the fruition of all our labors was awaiting—and only awaiting—the appearance of a measure admittedly well adapted to the present-day conditions of American farm life and agreeable to the temperament of American farm citizenship. In this it seems that my position was not well taken; that a difference over principle and not of details is halting progress in this body and is preventing the consideration of this legislation.

The chairman of the subcommittee on banking and currency, Mr. BULKLEY, of Ohio, stated to the House recently that in his opinion a controversy over Government aid is the only thing which has prevented a complete agreement on rural credits. This is equivalent to saying that a disagreement over Government aid is preventing legislation on this subject. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] is one of the ablest Members of this body. His large store of information, his industrious habits, enthusiastic temperament, and uniformly courteous manner have won for him the high esteem of the membership of this House; and his opinion will be taken by all to reflect his mature conviction that unless an accommodation can be secured this legislation will fail at this session. His declaration demands that this discordant element be given a most thorough discussion.

Second in importance, if, indeed, it can be said to be subordinate in any degree, is his criticism of Secretary Houston's attitude and utterances on this subject. The remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] will be taken by the general public in connection with the circular issued by a committee purporting to represent the progressive granges of the Nation and other like publications. The Washington Herald, of December 28, contains the following comment on the remarks under consideration:

A veiled attack upon the administration for its failure to insist upon rural-credit legislation at this session was made in the House a week ago by Representative BULKLEY, of Ohio, a Democratic leader; and there is a considerable element of Democrats in both Houses that feel resentful over the administration's apparent abandonment of the rural-credit bill.

The impression has been created, whether designedly or not, that Secretary Houston is antagonistic toward the enactment of rural-credit legislation, and that in this manner and to this degree the present administration is violating the plighted faith of the Democratic Party to the detriment of the American farmer.

In a country like ours, where all power permanently resides in the people and the exercise of it is delegated to certain officials for limited time and for specific purposes, no question can exceed in importance that of the good faith and honesty of purpose of those who hold this delegated power. If it be true that the administration is covertly opposing rural-credit legislation and is not in good faith desiring to redeem the pledges of the Democratic Party, then this most important fact should be known. If it be untrue, then there should be an equally frank acknowledgment, and there should be an end to all effort to shift responsibility for delay from Congress to the executive branch of the Government. For these reasons, I shall confine my remarks to a discussion of these two propositions.

I wish to disavow any controversy on the part of the United States commission over the question of Government aid as applied to rural-credit legislation. In our report, page 22, in discussing the feature of State aid, the commission said:

There is room for honest difference of opinion as to the question of State aid, if only European experience is consulted. In every instance in Europe where Government capital has been granted to establish mortgage credit the results have been favorable to the agricultural interests of that nation. It is our opinion that such aid should not be extended in the United States.

I desire now to elaborate on that opinion and to give in detail some of the reasons which led to that unanimous conclusion on the part of the commission.

I had the very great privilege to visit some of the leading European countries and of studying the actual conditions of their farm life as it exists to-day. The universal testimony is to the effect that conditions have improved immeasurably in peasant life since the date when these institutions were first organized in those countries; but taking conditions as they now exist and comparing them with the conditions which surround American farm homes, the conviction is forced that European precedents are of but little, if any, value in framing American legislation to meet American conditions and purposes. This was the conclusion of practically every American official resident in Europe whom we met during our visit, as well as that of American business men with European residence and connections. In Europe the great struggle has been to escape from the servitudes imposed by the feudal system and to assist the agricultural class to rise from a state of serfdom imposed by an absolute government to that of an independent land-owning class. The only parallel which we can find in our history would be the struggles of the emancipated slaves who were liberated as a result of our Civil War. Down at the base of practically every system of government-capitalized mortgage banks in Europe lay an urgent necessity for social reform. This condition is so well understood by European students that this class of institutions was not emphasized before our commission. Dr. Augsbin, in an address before our commission in Berlin on the subject of mortgage banks, used these words:

The American farmer of to-day does not need any subsidy, nor would he accept it; but what he needs is a cheaply acquired credit on long-term mortgages and with the right of amortization. These credit facilities provided to your farmers would secure to your country greater productivity at less cost from the farms now under cultivation and, above all, give you more farms and more farmers. (Agricultural Co-operation and Rural Credit in Europe, p. 390.)

Dr. Augsbin is an authority on this subject who was delegated by the German Government to present it to our commission from a German viewpoint. He has traveled extensively in this country, and is firm in the opinion that no subsidy is necessary from the Government in order to establish mortgage banking in this country and to give our farmers cheap credit on long-time mortgage security. The conclusion of our commission is thus sustained by this eminent German authority, who is well acquainted with the operations of subsidized systems of mortgage banks.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Will it disconcert the gentleman to yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. It will not disconcert me, but I will say to the gentleman, if it is just the same to him, I would prefer to continue and quote some indorsements which I have prepared, and then, if I have time, I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. President Wilson has also supported our position by declaring that—

The farmers, of course, ask, and should be given, no special privileges, such as extending to them the credit of the Government itself.

Secretary Houston states in his annual report that—

There seems to be no emergency which requires or justifies Government assistance to the farmers directly through the use of the Government's cash or the Government's credit. It is the judgment of the best students of economic conditions here that there is needed to supplement existing agencies a proper land-mortgage banking system, operating through private funds, just as other banking systems operate, and this judgment is shared by the leaders of economic thought abroad.

Mr. Herrick, late ambassador to France and a profound student of banking, both in Europe and America, strongly supports the commission in its position on State aid. In his recent volume on "Rural Credits" Mr. Herrick warns against Government subsidy to mortgage banks as class legislation and declares it to be a perversion of the proper functions of government in a Republic. He states that in nearly all European Governments where direct Government aid has been granted it has led to bureaucracy, favoritism, and politics. Even more significant, and to American lawmakers more important, is his declaration that financial assistance is no longer extended in Europe except to institutions organized to help the poor to acquire homes or small tracts of agricultural lands. (P. 224, Rural Credits, by Herrick.)

Mr. David Lubin, of California, has done more to agitate and educate our people on this subject than any other American citizen. He has resided in Europe for some years, is the American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture, and has an intimate personal knowledge of conditions in both Europe and America. His ability and sound judgment as a business man have enabled him to achieve signal success in agricultural and commercial fields of activity. Mr. Lubin is absolutely opposed to the grants, either of money or credit, by the Government to found systems of mortgage credit in the United States, and indorses the purely mutual associations of borrowers as the best instrumentality to secure cheap credit on long-time mortgage security.

Jesse E. Pope, in the Quarterly Journal of Economics for August, 1914, in a discussion of "Agricultural credit," speaking of European conditions, says:

Not only does direct financial assistance by the State tend to demoralize the individual, but in the long run it also dries up the sources of credit. This is the testimony of most Europeans who have given their lives to the solution of the problems of agricultural credit. Some of them at first advocated State aid; but when confronted with its results they became its ardent opponents. (August Quarterly, p. 739.)

And, finally, our commission secures a most emphatic indorsement in the Executive Bulletin, by the Hon. Emmet O'Neal, governor of Alabama, chairman of the committee of 12 governors of States which was appointed at the governors' conference at Richmond, Va., to prepare bills on rural credits to be submitted to the several State legislatures. This committee, after full consideration of the subject, decided that it was impractical to draft specific bills, but voted to draft a report declaring the fundamental principles which, in their judgment, should control legislation on this subject. The report is dated November 10, 1914. I quote in full what is said under the heading of Government subsidy.

The establishing of a wise, just, or successful system of land-mortgage banks can be accomplished without direct Federal aid, without subsidies or loans. With just and liberal enactments, properly safeguarding the lender, with rigid appraisement of values, with a simplified system of land-title registration or insurance, the savings of the Nation will gladly invest in these securities. No form of investment can be made more attractive or secure. Bills which seek direct Federal loans are unwise and will only delay or jeopardize the success of legislation on this subject.

Your committee indorses the views of the United States commission when they declare, "It is wise legislation rather than liberal appropriations or loans which rural credit mostly needs at our hands."

These indorsements can be extended to great lengths; but more impressive than words are actual accomplishments; and it is undeniably true that mortgage banking is being rapidly organized and extended in the United States without State aid, thus verifying by the results of actual experience the recommendation of our commission. The building and loan associations in the United States are extending their operations to include farm mortgages on periodic payments. In the State of Ohio these associations report aggregate farm loans exceeding $11,000,000, with a maximum period of maturity running to 16 years.

In Indiana, under a recent State law, a million-dollar corporation has been organized, with a paid-in capital of $250,000, to grant long-time credit on real-estate mortgages by issuing debenture bonds. This corporation is financed without any State aid and with no exclusive grants of territory. The president of this corporation in a recent letter to me states that the demand for copies of their constitution and articles of incorporation is so great as to necessitate having a special edition printed for general distribution. Real-estate loans are now being granted in Wisconsin under State law and without State aid, and a land bank with a minimum capital of $100,000 is being organized in New York to grant loans under similar general terms and conditions. In the State of Illinois Mr. Woodruff, of Joliet, has organized a successful and rapidly growing mortgage business by issuing debenture land bonds, based on real-estate mortgages on Illinois improved farm lands and guaranteed by the capital of his banking corporation. Without the aid of supervision, either by the State or Nation, Mr. Woodruff has sold large issues of land bonds. His plan of operation is that of a private joint-stock bank, issuing debenture bonds. In a letter to me Mr. Woodruff indorses the position of the United States commission. In opposition to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio that mortgage credit can probably not be successfully organized without direct Government financial assistance, I will place the developments in these five great agricultural States—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and New York. Thus the position of our commission is not only sustained by the mature convictions of students and political economists, but also by the actual growth and development of successful institutions over a large and representative area of our Nation.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I would prefer to wait until I shall have completed my remarks and then I will gladly yield to the gentleman, if I have time.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] did not quote a single authority or American precedent to sustain his contention that direct financial aid by the Government is essential to the successful organization of agricultural credit in the United States, but rests his contention on historical precedents. I have quoted Mr. Herrick to the effect that even the countries of Europe have abandoned subsidies, but I wish now to examine more carefully the conditions under which such a policy was originally adopted. Any study of European institutions which neglects to give particular attention to the social and economic conditions of the inhabitants of those countries at the moment of the organization of such institutions will fail to secure correct conclusions.

In order to draw a contrast between the problem as it was then presented to those Governments and as it is now presented to us I desire to refer to a recent gathering of farmers in my own State. In the summer of 1913 I had the honor to deliver an address before the cattle feeders and corn growers of our State on the occasion of their annual picnic. The meeting was held on the historic battle field of old Tippecanoe, and the attendance included, as it always does, representative farmers from every county in the State. A census was taken of the attendance and of the automobiles parked on the grounds. There were 1,945 machines, with an aggregate value of not less than $2,000,000. This meeting can be duplicated in perhaps any of the corn-belt States. Large numbers of automobiles can be seen at any farm sale or neighborhood picnic in any farm community.

Let us contrast this picture of wealth and business ability with the conditions which prevailed in Germany at the time when the first association was formed in that country. It is a picture of a country laid desolate by the ravages of a seven-years' war. The Government granted $216,000 as an aid to the organization and operation of this association, which has been cited by the gentleman from Ohio as a reason why we should now give direct aid to mortgage banks in this country. I quote from Herrick's Rural Credits, page 37:

Many States had been entirely ruined, notably those in which armies had been encamped for a long time. The soil remained, it is true, but all which was necessary to give it value disappeared. Buildings were burned. The scattered live stock had died of hunger. Farm implements were rusted and rotten and the fields lay uncultivated. The value of the land had diminished 50 or 60 per cent, and where the owner had owed a large part before the war he was utterly unable to pay the interest on his debt, to say nothing about the principal at maturity. Numerous defaults were made, and the resulting foreclosures reduced the land values still further and excited the distrust of the money lender, who thereupon demanded repayment of all sums advanced, and thus brought about a crisis.

It has happily been more than 50 years since such conditions prevailed in any section of our country; and what shall be said of that statesmanship which seeks to go back to the desolation of the Civil War and to the miseries of the days of reconstruction to find conditions which might justify the passage of legislation which is urged to further increase the happy and prosperous conditions of to-day?

Reference has been made to Hungary, and the institutions of that kingdom have been selected in part by the subcommittee on Banking and Currency as their model. Let us review the conditions under which this institution was organized and subsidized in part by the Government. I quote from Rural Credit and Cooperation in Hungary, pages 26–27. This is a volume compiled by the Hungarian Government expressly for the use of the United States commission in making a study of their national institutions during our visit to that country.

It was this class (the gentry landowners) which suffered most heavily from the havoc wrought during the war of independence, 1848–49, and from the grave economic consequences of the same, as well as from the various measures taken by the absolute government—in particular, the confiscation and destruction of 60,000,000 florins ($24,000,000) worth of Hungarian bank notes, the suspension of the moratorium that had been granted to landowners at the very time when an enormous slump in the price of corn had taken the world by surprise, and the very injudicious and inopportune restrictive policy of the absolute government toward Hungarian savings banks. This combination of circumstances made the transition to a more modern system of farming in conformity with the changed conditions practically a catastrophe for the landowning middle class. At the same time the cheapest rate of interest at which mortgage loans could be secured, even on unencumbered real estate, was 18 to 20 per cent. Nor was the lot of the emancipated vassals a better one.

Again we have a recital of war's desolation, radical change in social condition of inhabitants, and the repressive acts of an absolute government. Not even in the desolation and miseries following our great Civil War in the Southland can parallel conditions be established.

Russia has been drawn upon to contribute precedents to justify the grants of direct aid to mortgage banks in the United States under the policy of our "new freedom." In regard to territorial expanse Russia and the United States have great similarity, but in no other respect can a parallel be drawn. I have seen it stated recently that 70 per cent of the Russian peasants can neither read nor write.

The history of mortgage banking in Russia, as we are considering it, dates from the liberation of the serfs and thus involves the question of social reform. For a description of the actual conditions I quote from Mortgage Banking in Russia, by Fredericksen:

"The liberation of the serfs in 1860 marks an epoch in all things Russian. The change itself was of less immediate consequence to most serfs than to their masters. The former wanted to be free and to become the owners of the land. The latter wanted them to be free but to have no land. What took place was a division of the land, giving to 8,000,000 'souls' (male peasants paying the capitation tax), or about 20,000,000 persons, about 30 per cent of the land, the nobility retaining 24 per cent and the Crown and the Crown tenants owning the remainder. Each 'soul' obtained from 3 to 4 'deciatines,' giving to every family of three male members from 25 to 40 acres. The peasants had hoped for more land, and in many cases preferred compulsory labor on the manor to compulsory purchase of the land now adopted. Each village community was, when the change was finally completed at the accession of Alexander III, compelled to purchase its land from the Government in common, paying to the Government besides the interest at 6 per cent a small annual installment which will redeem the land in 49 years and which is assessed with other taxes on each village community. The nobles are paid for the land in Government bonds of different kinds. Thus the old village community was continued, and to-day the 'three-field system,' with a lot around each house owned individually, long narrow scattered strips of plow land allotted periodically, and pasture land held in common is still the usual mode of Russian agriculture."

We have here presented as the chief elements the liberation of a generation of serfs, the forced division, sale, and purchase of the lands of a great empire with the Government credit financing the undertaking.

It is admitted that the Government treasury lost large sums in taxes, remitted to the debt-owing liberated serfs, while maintaining the payments which the Government was pledged to make to the nobles whose estates were forcibly taken and divided among their former tenants. Happily no such condition ever prevailed in the United States, nor can our Government ever have similar motives for taking such extraordinary legislative process.

The history of France has been drawn upon to sustain the contention which the advocates of subsidy legislation are raising. That nation has unhappily passed through social and political revolution, which was caused in large part by the miseries and wrongs endured by her peasant population. The guillotine was erected in the public square of Paris. These conditions did not suddenly develop, but were the growth of generations of misgovernment and misrule. In speaking of the general conditions prevailing in France, Herrick says:

In the beginning of the last century credit facilities in France were in bad condition, mainly because of defective laws regarding the registration of instruments affecting the title or possession of land. A lender who took a mortgage was never sure of recovering his claim in case of foreclosure. Consequently money was scarce and usury was rife. The land was so heavily encumbered with debts which had been accumulated for generations that its returns were barely sufficient to pay taxes and annual dues. In 1826 the farmers and landowners were on the verge of bankruptcy.

These conditions grew worse until, in 1852, the Credit Foncier was organized in part with capital supplied by the State. It is a joint-stock bank, securing its successive increases of capital by the sale of shares of stock to individual investors. The bank does not do an exclusive farm business, but loans to municipalities and on urban properties, and finances large projects in the French African colonies. These loans constitute the larger part of its operations, and it is not contended that this bank has ever supplied even a large fractional part of the loans to French farmers. Less than 10 per cent of the total rural mortgage indebtedness of France is held by the Credit Foncier, after enjoying a monopoly and Government subsidy for 62 years. Within that time France has lost 40 per cent of her rural population, and has recently enacted legislation granting a loan of $2,000 to any French citizen to purchase a farm home, and promises a pension for life to him if he will reside on the tract so purchased until he is 65 years of age. The Government of France also gives her farmers free State insurance against losses by hailstorms. Other systems of rural banks are assisted by the Government. In summing up his discussion of French agricultural credit Mr. Herrick, who is the best American authority on this subject, says:

State aid, which has been so lavishly extended in France, is a conspicuous failure when considered from the viewpoint of the hopes entertained in 1890. Even its partisans are far from satisfied with the progress made, and are now contemplating amendments to the laws in order to bring about vital changes in the credit Agricolt Mutuel.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MOSS of Indiana. I would prefer, Mr. Chairman, to go on with the remarks as I have them prepared, and after I close I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman will not then have any time to yield. We have heard a great many of these rural-credit talks, but we have not had any rural-credit legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman is discussing a very important question, and there ought to be a quorum here to hear him. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point. This is only to bring out both sides of the question. I ask that the speaker be allowed to finish his remarks.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman a question a little while ago, and he declined to be interrupted; and I now make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-one Members are present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. FOSTER having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 20150) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] desires leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss] desires unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BATHRICK. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I have already objected.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOWARD) there were—ayes 15, noes 24.

Accordingly the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-one Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Chair state that there is not a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 29, noes 15.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, January 2, 1915, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $40,000 to enable the Government of the United States to participate in the Second Pan American Scientific Congress to be held at the city of Washington, D. C., in October, 1915 (H. Doc. No. 1468); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. Letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of mouth of Brazos River, up to Freeport, Tex., with a view to securing a depth of 25 feet (H. Doc. No. 1469); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. CURRY, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 391) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to postpone the sale of fur-seal skins now in the possession of the Government until such time as in his discretion he may deem such sale advisable, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1256), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 20470) to divorce transportation in interstate and foreign commerce from manufacture, mining, production, and dealing, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LEWIS of Maryland: A bill (H. R. 20471) to secure to the United States a monopoly of electrical means for the transmission of intelligence for hire; to provide for the acquisition by the Post Office Department of the telephone networks; and to license certain telephone lines, radio and telegraph agencies; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill (H. R. 20472) providing for a site and public building for a post office at Anaconda, Mont.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 20473) to provide for enlarging the United States building at Waterbury, Conn.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Utah: A bill (H. R. 20474) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to patent certain lands to the State of Utah and to accept from said State certain other lands in lieu thereof; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. TOWNER: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 395) authorizing the President of the United States of America to prohibit by proclamation the exportation of arms, ammunition, and munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 20475) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Hart; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 20476) to correct the military record of John Minster; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CRAMTON: A bill (H. R. 20477) granting a pension to Laura J. Spencer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ESTOPINAL: A bill (H. R. 20478) granting a pension to Joseph H. McIntyre; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FERRIS: A bill (H. R. 20479) granting a pension to Lillie R. Abbott; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRANCIS: A bill (H. R. 20480) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Glaspy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20481) granting an increase of pension to Dixon M. Hepburn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20482) granting an increase of pension to Peter Wagner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOWARD: A bill (H. R. 20483) granting a pension to William A. Bowen; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20484) granting a pension to James J. Huff; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LLOYD: A bill (H. R. 20485) granting an increase of pension to Matthias Harttenschwiller; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOORE: A bill (H. R. 20486) granting an increase of pension to Artemas C. Barclay; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PLUMLEY: A bill (H. R. 20487) granting a pension to James E. Welch; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. REED: A bill (H. R. 20488) granting an increase of pension to Charles R. Brackett; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SINNOTT: A bill (H. R. 20489) granting an increase of pension to Evalyn Wakefield; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20490) for the relief of Edson Watson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. STONE: A bill (H. R. 20491) granting a pension to Rosa L. Huebner; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20492) granting an increase of pension to James Sterns; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 20493) granting an increase of pension to Andrew R. Jones; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAVENNER: A bill (H. R. 20494) granting a pension to Mary Gertrude Russell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 20495) granting a pension to Arthur L. Perry; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of J. L. Amstutz and 37 other citizens of Wayne County, Ohio, asking for the passage of House joint resolution 377, relative to munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BEAKES: Petitions of 100 citizens of Jackson, Mich., favoring House joint resolution 377, relative to export of munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GERRY: Petition of Mrs. R. I. Gammell, of Providence, R. I., protesting against equal suffrage; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petitions of C. A. Crombe, George W. Eddy, Walter Hazard, of Wickford; Mrs. Sarah M. R. Aldrich, Mrs. Alice B. Ham, Marion W. Jenks, Mrs. J. W. North, Ellen M. Anthony, Barton P. Jenks, Rhode Island State Grange, and Rhode Island Woman Suffrage Association, of Providence; Helena Sturtevant, of Middletown; and Pawtucket Woman Suffrage League, of Pawtucket, all in the State of Rhode Island, favoring equal suffrage; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. O'LEARY: Petition of citizens of the second New York congressional district, favoring House joint resolution 377, relative to munitions of war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: Petition of citizens of Los Angeles, Cal., favoring the passage of the Hamill bill, H. R. 5139; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Also, petition of Branch No. 97, Catholic Knights of America, protesting against the publication of the Menace; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, memorial of Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Orange Grove Lodge, No. 97, of Los Angeles, Cal., favoring the passage of the Cummins-Goeke bill (H. R. 17894); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Central Labor Council, Los Angeles, Cal., relative to increase in the wages of the employees on the Canal Zone; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, memorial of employees in engine and train service, San Francisco, Cal., favoring the passage of the Cummins-Goeke bills (S. 6165 and H. R. 17894); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of J. C. Ernst, of Los Angeles, Cal., protesting against printing of return envelopes by the Post Office Department; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. SWITZER: Protests of 820 citizens of the tenth congressional district of Ohio, petitioning for legislation to forbid the use of the United States mails to The Menace and similar publications; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WALLIN: Petition of sundry citizens of the thirtieth New York district, favoring the passage of S. 3672, for the straightening of the Harlem River; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 2, 1915.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, December 29, 1914.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business, House bill 6060, the so-called immigration bill. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I raise the point of the lack of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Gronna	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Hardwick	Overman	Smoot
Burton	James	Page	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson	Perkins	Swanson
Clapp	Kern	Reed	Thornton
Clarke, Ark.	Lodge	Robinson	Townsend
Culberson	McCumber	Sheppard	Vardaman
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	White
Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Gallinger	Norris	Smith, Ga.

Mr. REED. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. STONE]. I believe he will be able to return to the Senate some time later in the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and that he is paired on all votes with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SWANSON. My colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. LODGE. My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent. He has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present. The Secretary will call the list of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. THOMAS answered to their names when called.

Mr. HOLLIS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second roll call still discloses the absence of a quorum. What is the pleasure of the Senators present?

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will take due notice and enforce the order accordingly.

Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. MYERS, and Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 19906) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. PITTMAN presented the credentials of FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, chosen by the electors of the State of Nevada a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1915, which were read and ordered to be filed.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, which is merely to make the bill conform to the present law: On page 26, line 2, following the second semicolon, I move to insert "whether in possession of $50, and, if less, how much." That has been suggested in order to keep the statistical tables correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will note the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not hear the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, and I should like to have the Secretary report the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, following the word "paid" and the semicolon on line 2, it is proposed to insert "whether in possession of $50, and, if less, how much."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As I stated, the reason for that amendment is that statistics are being kept under the law, and the department is desirous of knowing how much immigrants bring in up to $50; and then the amendment states, "if less, how much," so that no matter how small an amount an immigrant should bring in the department wants to keep the table so as to show the total so brought in.

Mr. SMOOT. Does that interfere in any way with the amount required at the present time?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the amount required at present is $30, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And this is not intended in any way to increase that requirement of $30 to $50?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina. Unless there is objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On page 42, line 5, after the word "entered," I move to insert "or who shall be found in." I desire that the amendment be read at the desk, and then I will make an explanation of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is an amendment to an amendment which has already been adopted.

Mr. LODGE. Then the amendment will have to be offered in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I withdraw the amendment. I did not notice that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote whereby the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered now, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment may be offered.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the vote whereby the amendment was adopted may be reconsidered, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina may then be offered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In order to expedite business, I move that the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered in order that the amendment may be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there be objection the motion is agreed to. The Chair hears none. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, line 5, after the word "entered," in the committee amendment, it is proposed to insert the words "or who shall be found in."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may we have the whole amendment stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole amendment will be now read, and the question then will be on the adoption of the committee amendment in amended form. The Secretary will state the amendment as amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, beginning in line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "who shall enter the United States in violation of law" and to insert "any alien who shall have entered or who shall be found in the United States in violation of this act or of any law of the United States, or who at the time of entry was a member of one or more of the classes excluded by law."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as amended. Unless there is objection it is agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On page 63, line 8——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to make a motion to test the Senate's idea of taking a recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withhold his request just for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina declines to yield for the present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On page 63, line 8, after the word "descent," I propose to insert the words "except as provided in section 19 hereof." The reason for that amendment will be obvious to all who will read the language of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, line 8, after the word "descent," it is proposed to insert the words "except as provided in section 19 hereof," so that, if amended, the proviso will read as follows:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend existing laws relating to the immigration or exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent except as provided in section 19 hereof, nor to repeal, alter, or amend section 6, chapter 453, third session Fifty-eighth Congress, approved February 6, 1905, or the act approved August 2, 1882, entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea," and amendments thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There is just one other verbal change which is necessary to clarify the law. On page 63, line 17, I propose to strike out the word "last" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "third," for the reason that certain amendments have been made to that section which require that change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, line 17, before the word "proviso," it is proposed to strike out the word "last" and to insert the word "third," so that it will read "except as mentioned in the third proviso of section 19 hereof."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There have been other provisos added, and this occurs in the third. Therefore the word "last" would be misleading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On page 12, line 25, after the word "alien" and before the word "for," I propose to insert the word "female"; in the same line I move to strike out the word "for" at the end of the line; and on page 13, line 1, I move to strike out the words "any other immoral purpose" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "to import any alien male for immoral purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 25, after the word "alien," it is proposed to insert the word "female"; at the end of the same line to strike out the word "for"; on line 1, page 13, to strike out the words "any other immoral purposes," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "to import any alien male for immoral purposes," so that if amended it will read:

SEC. 4. That the importation into the United States of any alien for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose is hereby forbidden, and whoever shall, directly or indirectly, import, or attempt to import, into the United States any alien female for the purpose of prostitution or to import any alien male for immoral purposes, or shall hold or attempt to hold any alien for any such purpose in pursuance of such illegal importation, or shall keep, maintain, control, support, employ, or harbor in any house or other place for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose any alien in pursuance of such illegal importation shall in every such case be deemed guilty of a felony.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment. Unless there is objection, it is agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has been recognized.

Mr. REED. I yield to the chairman of the committee, if he wants to perfect some language of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On page 62, line 19, after the word "and," I move to strike out "fourteen" and to insert "fifteen," so as to make the act take effect July 1, 1915, instead of 1914.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the amendment is agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, former President Taft is before the Philippines Committee this morning by its invitation, and is delivering a very interesting dissertation upon the condition of the Philippine Islands and upon the various features of the bill now pending in regard to the Philippines. I think all the members of the committee, with the exception of myself, are present at the hearing, and quite a concourse of people have assembled. The members of the committee requested me to come to the Senate and ask it to take a recess until half past 12 o'clock. In view of the fact that Mr. Taft has been President of the United States, that he has come here for the purpose of giving his advice—and he is undoubtedly one of the best-informed men in the United States with reference to the Philippines—I move that the Senate take a recess until half past 12 o'clock.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Before the motion is put, I should be very glad if the Senator would allow me to offer a very brief amendment to the immigration bill, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. NELSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 7, line 11, after the word "parents," it is proposed to strike out "at the discretion of the Secretary of Labor or under such regulations as he may from time to time prescribe" and in lieu thereof to insert "except that any such children may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, be admitted if in his opinion they are not likely to become a public charge and are otherwise eligible."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment. Unless there is objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for proper reference and also to present an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will require unanimous consent to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have asked unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent at this time to introduce a bill. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate take a recess until 12.30 o'clock.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to strike out, on page 14, lines 14 to 16, the words "or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The SECRETARY. In section 5, page 14, line 14, after the name "United States," it is proposed to strike out "or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. REED. I merely want to say a word about it. The section in which this language appears, being section 5, provides that it shall be unlawful to prepay the transportation of people coming to this country, and it provides further:

> For every violation of any of the provisions of this section the person, partnership, company, or corporation violating the same shall forfeit and pay for each offense the sum of $1,000, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States—

That far I think the section absolutely unobjectionable. The language I am calling attention to and which I am asking to have stricken out is this:

> or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit.

Under that language, as it stands, any individual, even though he knew that the Government was prosecuting an inquiry and was about to bring action, or a series of actions, could rush into court and file suit first and recover the penalties for himself. I hardly think that is wise. I think it is very rare that a person bringing a suit for a violation of a criminal statute is permitted to retain the entire proceeds of the fine or penalty. Sometimes a person is permitted to retain a percentage of the fine or penalty, but as this clause is now drawn, if the United States authorities were investigating and were about to proceed with suits to recover penalties, an individual could rush into court and file his complaint a day or an hour before the Government authorities had filed their papers, and he could recover the fines entirely for himself. It seems to me that is extreme; it seems to me it is bad, and that the words ought to go out of the bill.

If it were desired to secure information in the prosecution of suits, I should not object if they allowed the person bringing the suit to recover a portion of the penalty, but to give him the right to recover all of the penalty seems to me to be unprecedented. Generally speaking, the promotion of litigation by offering the penalties, which ought to go to the public, to the informer or to the person bringing the suit is bad policy. In most States that kind of legislation is discountenanced. I have no desire to take the time of the Senate further. I have stated the matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Missouri that that is now the existing law. It has been in operation since 1907, and no complaint has come to the committee from anyone as to the abuse which the Senator suspects may arise under it. This is the first time my attention has been called to it, and I do not know how it has operated; but the committee has no information that it has been abused nor have any cases of such abuse been cited.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am informed that this provision is existing law, but I believe there is a great deal of merit in the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri. I believe the provision should be stricken out. If I may again refer to the case arising in North Dakota to which I called attention a few days ago, I believe that if this language had not been in the law the farmer to whom I referred would not have had suit entered against him for a thousand dollars in the case of each of the individuals from Canada whom he had employed to work for him. I know of at least one instance where advantage was taken of this particular provision of the law, and I can see no good reason why an individual should be allowed to cause another individual any expense or any trouble. I can see no good in the provision, and it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I think this is a very vicious provision to be included in this or in any similar law. The mere fact that it is taken from the existing statute should not in itself restrain the Senate from striking it out at this time.

Section 5 of the bill prohibits what is called the importation of contract labor. It then imposes a fine or a forfeit of $1,000 for every offense, and the offense may consist either of a specific agreement to give employment to an alien when he comes here, or it may consist in an attempt to induce or assist aliens to come here. The statute further provides that the United States Government may institute an action to recover the forfeit. Up to that point, perhaps, there is no objection to this measure; but now comes this additional provision, which states that such an action may be brought by any person, notwithstanding what the Government may do or may not do. The language is that this sum may be recovered—> by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit, including any such aliens thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid.

That opens the door, Mr. President, to the grossest kind of blackmail. An alien can come into this country, and, under this statute he can claim—though his claim may have no foundation other than his own assertion—that he was induced to come into this country by some individual or corporation; and if the court believes his statement the one who was induced to come here may recover a thousand dollars and retain it.

I hope this provision will be stricken out.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator from New York in what condition, if this amendment is adopted, the law will be as to being made effective, as to the punishment of those who do violate the law?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Why, take, for illustration, the case of an alien who has been induced, in violation of the statute, to come into this country. He may give his information to the United States authorities, or they will acquire it in ordinary course, at our various ports. They will communicate their information to the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice, if the case is sufficiently clear, will commence its suit against the offending person and recover the forfeit.

Mr. BORAH. The amendment has the effect of taking out of the bill the inducement to activity upon the part of individuals.

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; there may be other inducements short of the one provided for in the bill. The bill gives to an alien who comes here in violation of the law the extraordinary remedy of commencing an action and recovering the entire penalty and retaining it for himself.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Surely.

Mr. CLAPP. It seems to me this is the most vicious form of informer provision along this line that we have ever had. I think we rejected the whole principle of the informer in our antitrust legislation after debating the proposition. Now, this law—and the fact that this provision has been in the law is no reason simply of itself why it should remain there—goes further than that, and holds out to the man who has violated the law, or who will claim a violation of the law, an inducement backed by the prospect of recovery by himself of the fine.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. He can violate the law and then make money out of it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. It encourages blackmailing a man, because back of the effort to blackmail is the blackmailer's own benefit in the way of the thousand-dollar fine which he recovers. It seems to me that it is intolerable in connection with our American principles.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In this connection I should like to call attention to an instance that came under my observation recently, showing how drastic this law is, without giving the alien the right to invoke its benefits by an individual suit.

A lawyer in the city of Buffalo not many months since received a letter from a lawyer's clerk in Toronto, Canada, in which the writer said he had been employed in a law office for nearly 30 years; that his work was largely that of a scrivener. Indeed, he did the class of work in a law office that in most offices in this country is now done by the typewriter. He asked if he could get employment if he came over to Buffalo. If you remember, it is probably only an hour's distance. The Buffalo lawyer acknowledged the letter and said: "I shall be glad to see you when you come over here." The clerk came over and was employed, I think, at $12 a week, or some such salary. There probably was no other man in the law office in Buffalo who could do the particular work that this individual was able to do. The attention of the Federal authorities was called to this alleged violation of the law, and the Department of Justice communicated with the district attorney at Buffalo. There seemed to be such a complete absence of any design or purpose to evade or violate the law that no proceeding was taken to prosecute the lawyer in Buffalo, but if the clerk who sought the position and who received the encouragement to come over to Buffalo and make a personal application for the place was so inclined he could avail himself of this particular paragraph of the law and demand a thousand dollars' forfeit, just as was done in the case the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] spoke about some days ago.

I hope this provision will be stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this provision, which is in the existing law, if my memory serves me right, goes back some distance in our legislation. It was put in owing to the extreme difficulty in getting evidence of violations of the contract-labor law.

I was on a committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the subject of contract labor in 1893, I think. Senator David B. Hill, of New York, was chairman of the committee. We held an investigation in the city of New York. The committee obtained an entire conviction in their own minds that the contract-labor law was being violated in many ways; but they were met at every step, when they made inquiries of the law officers of the Government, with the statement that it was extremely difficult to get the necessary evidence, or to get information which would enable them to enforce the law. It was for that purpose that this provision was put in—to get the evidence and to get the information necessary for enforcing the contract-labor law.

I see very plainly the objection to giving to the informer the right to sue and recover; but the contract-labor law is an extremely difficult one to enforce. It is extremely difficult to get the evidence necessary, and that is the reason for this clause. I know it is exceptional, but I think it was felt at the time by the committees of both Houses that it was necessary to have some exceptional provision in order to enforce the contract-labor law as it should be enforced.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to put an inquiry to the Senator from Massachusetts. Does not the Senator from Massachusetts believe that an opportunity to reward the informer under the terms of this language is likely to be a prolific source of blackmail and oppression?

Mr. LODGE. It has not been, as a matter of fact.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In the instance cited a few days ago by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] it was.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know about that particular instance, except that I believe I am right in saying that the farmer was trying to bring in some Hindus from Canada—nine, I think—and it was a clear violation of the law. I do not know how the information was given, but there was no doubt that it was a violation of the contract-labor law.

As the senior Senator from New York has suggested, and as the junior Senator from New York well knows, this is not a new plan. It has been adopted in many criminal statutes where it has been found necessary in order to get information for the enforcement of the law.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, does the Senator recall any criminal statute where the party himself, who assumes the rôle of informer, is rewarded? I do not think we have ever carried legislation to that extent. We have carried it to the extent of rewarding the informer; but this, it seems to me, goes farther than any legislation we have ever had and rewards the individual who is a party to the offense, or alleges himself to be.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that has been uncommon in criminal legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. I certainly think it has.

Mr. LODGE. But it is a question of the enforcement of this law; and, as I have said, it is extremely difficult to get the evidence. I do not like the business of rewarding informers in any law, but sometimes it becomes absolutely necessary, just as it becomes absolutely necessary for the law officers of the Government to grant immunity, we may say, to a criminal who turns State's evidence. It is undesirable, perhaps, theoretically, but it becomes necessary for the punishment of crime; and from my experience on that committee I know the extreme difficulty there is in getting the evidence.

We found in New York many cases of Italian padrones who brought young boys to this country and held them under an agreement and took all their wages. The cases were clear enough, but it was almost impossible for our law officers to get the necessary information to prove a case in court.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator does not suggest that the condition to which he refers obtains at this time in New York among the Italians?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, I mentioned New York only because it was there that we happened to hold the inquiry. I have no doubt it obtained in Boston and elsewhere. No; I do not think it does.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That was a very objectionable practice, which was corrected many years ago in various cities of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I think it was corrected very largely as a result of that investigation; but it existed. I used it only as an illustration. It was to reach similar cases that this provision was put in the law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I find that the amendment that I offered, somewhat hastily, is not complete. I desire, therefore, to offer the following as my amendment:

On page 14, lines 14 to 17, strike out the following language:

> Or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit, including any such aliens thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid.

Mr. President, the fact that this clause has been in the law for some little time, and that no great wrong has yet developed, does not warrant us in allowing it to remain in the law. It is absolutely certain to my mind that some enterprising shyster lawyer will some day enter upon the exploitation of this clause of the law. It is also entirely plain to me that it will become a ready weapon in the hands of the blackmailer. It ought not to be left in. It is a sort of legal deadfall, which should not exist.

As I said a moment ago, I have known of many statutes which provided that an informer might receive a part of the penalty, but I have no recollection of any statute which provides that an informer shall receive the entire penalty; that he can even cut the Government out of the penalty by filing his suit five minutes before the Government brings its suit. Neither do I know of any law which rewards a party to a crime, which actually pays him a premium. I do know of many instances, as we all do, of men who have given information to the Government who have thereby escaped punishment themselves. This, however, is a question of rewarding the individual, of giving him the penalty, and it certainly is a very extreme measure.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that the only way you can get evidence of the importation of these laborers is by going abroad for the evidence, to some one there who knows of the facts or to the man himself who is brought here? And is not the Government greatly handicapped unless you do put some provision like that in here? Because you have to get the evidence from the man himself, or from some other person in the foreign country who heard of the inducement that was offered to bring the man here. I feel sure this provision should be kept in this bill, because it is the most effective possible way to prevent the importation by corporations of contract labor.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I can not agree with the Senator from Kentucky that those are the only means. Let me illustrate. A steamship company might be engaged in this business. Some employee of that steamship company might disclose the practice of inducing people to come here in violation of this statute. An employee, we will say, of a steel mill might know of these practices. The ordinary laborer in the steel mill might learn, from talking with men who came over and who took employment, that they had been brought over under inducements of some kind. The secret service of the whole Government is at the command of the Government.

Mr. JAMES. Of course that would be hearsay testimony only. You would have to go to the man himself in order to prove it.

Mr. REED. Why, of course, I understand that the mere fact that somebody told the man could not be produced in evidence; but if these men had told others, and the facts became known, and there were great crowds being brought in, it is almost certain that the Government, being put upon the trail of the evidence, could easily find somebody who would tell the facts; and they could follow it to the corporations themselves, put the agents of the corporations upon the stand, and disclose the truth of the matter in that way, just as we get at the fact that a trust has been formed. All of these questions, as the Senator knows—for he is a lawyer of eminence—have their difficulties, but they are not insurmountable ones.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator himself, though, as I recall, advocated such a provision in the antitrust bill. I know I myself advocated a provision of that character, because it is extremely hard to get these facts from any other person than those who are directly connected with them, generally, in the violation of the law. If it was a good thing in the case of the antitrust law, where all the people are here in this country, I can not see why it is not a very good thing where your testimony, if you do not rely upon something like this, has to be obtained from a country where we have no jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator is in error about my having advocated a proposition like this in any law.

Mr. JAMES. I did not say exactly like this, but I said that the Senator advocated a provision, if I am not mistaken, in the antitrust law which gave to any clerk or any person working for a corporation a reward in case of conviction.

Mr. REED. Exactly; that the Attorney General was authorized to make an agreement to pay a reward not exceeding 10 per cent of the penalties which might be recovered. I think it was 10 per cent. Now, that is very different from this.

I stated in the beginning of my remarks, when, I think, the Senator was absent, that if this bill provided that some portion of the penalty might be paid to an informer it would put it in a different class. This does not even go to the informer, to the man who furnishes the evidence. It goes to the man who first files a suit, and that man may be the individual who was imported himself. That is a startling proposition to me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will permit me, it seems to me that it would be a very difficult thing under this section to blackmail after all, for the reason that the basis of the right to recover is the finding that the law has been violated. There shall have first been a violation of the law and a finding to that effect, and upon that finding, as I understand the section, and by reason of it, this forfeiture is made. Anyone in the United States may sue for the forfeiture, or one of the aliens who has been brought over here may sue for the forfeiture. If the contract-labor law has been violated, is it unjust or at all unwise to permit the man who has been induced to come here to recover this forfeiture?

Mr. REED. I think it is highly unwise.

Mr. BORAH. He does not get his forfeiture by reason simply of giving information. He is not given this amount of money by reason of disclosing the fact; but if a judgment shall have been rendered to the effect that the law has been violated, he may then sue for the recovery.

Mr. REED. Answering the Senator from Idaho, of course it can be made the means of blackmail. Suppose a man is brought to this country under contract, and this law stands as it is now written. That individual can go to the man who brought him here and say, "If you do not give me $500, I shall file a suit, take the stand and testify, and you will have to pay $1,000; and, more than that, you will be liable to criminal penalties." So it could be used as a means of blackmail.

But notice now, this does not provide that whoever shall bring information to the Federal authorities leading to the arrest and conviction of a violator of this law shall be paid a portion of the penalty, but the proposed law, as it now stands, provides that any person may file a suit; and if he has filed it one minute before the Government has filed its petition his suit takes precedence and he recovers the penalty, and the Government gets nothing. I think that is extreme. But I do not desire to detain the Senate further.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to make only one observation in connection with the remarks made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. The very language of section 5 does not contemplate that before the alien begins his suit to recover the penalty it must previously have been adjudged that it was a violation. I think if the Senator will look at the section, he will find that all that need be done, if this law is to remain as it is, is that any alien can initiate a suit in his own name, whether it be well founded or not, and claim that he was induced to come into the country because of some promise or encouragement given to him by an American; and if he succeeds in making out his case, he will recover. But regarding the suggestion that this can be used as a means of blackmail, let us suppose a case where an alien, perhaps under the evil influence of some attorney, should say, "You promised to give me employment if I came to this country; you violated the law." The citizen might deny it, and yet under a threat that such a charge would be made against him he might, like in many other cases of blackmail, yield to the extortion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not believe I am in error as to the interpretation I place upon section 5. Perhaps I might have been misunderstood to mean that there should precede a judgment of violation before the party could recover. If so, in that respect I would be in error. But there must be at some time a determination or a judgment to the effect that the law has been violated. That is the basis of the right to recover. It may be in the same action which is brought for the purpose of recovery, but there must be a violation of the law and some tribunal or court must determine that there has been a violation of the law, and if there has been a violation of the law then the party may recover $1,000 or any part of it. I do not believe that would be an unwise provision to put in any bill. But we know—we have been informed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—that it has been almost impossible to enforce the law in regard to the importation of immigrants under contract, and it is being constantly, I am informed, violated. In these days it needs something in a drastic form in order to remedy the evil.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho before he takes his seat whether the importation of, say, 1,000 immigrants or contract laborers in a body would, under the phraseology of this section, constitute more than one offense, or whether the offense would be multiplied by as many times as there are contract laborers in the importation.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is a very great lawyer. What does the Senator think about it?

Mr. THOMAS. I am informed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] that that is covered by a clause in the same section. The clause to which my attention is called reads:

> And under either the civil or the criminal procedure mentioned separate suits or prosecutions may be brought for each alien thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid.

I think that would cover it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I want merely to make a suggestion about this provision. There is nothing new about it, nothing peculiar. It is the old qui tam action which has existed in our law time out of mind. The judiciary act—the act of February, 1799—provides:

> That if any informer on a penal statute, and to whom the penalty or any part thereof, if recovered, is directed to accrue, shall discontinue his suit or prosecution or shall be nonsuited in the same, or if upon trial judgment shall be rendered in favor of the defendant, unless such informer be an officer of the United States he shall be alone liable to the clerks, marshals, and attorneys for the fees of such prosecution.

Under that form of action, known to the common law, familiar both in England and America, and from the earliest times, it seems the person stigmatized as the informer in this character of litigation brings his suit. It is of no particular consequence whether the statute which allows him to bring it gives him all or half or any part of the proceeds of the penalty for which he sues. The statute which I have just read, which is indexed under the head of qui tam actions in the Revised Statutes of the United States, refers as an existing kind of action to the old qui tam action. I have not thought very much about whether this provision is necessary or desirable in these cases or not, but it is not anything new. It is merely applying to this particular statute the expedient which we have always from our early history availed of in a particular class of cases and a particular class of statutes, statutes where the information necessary to maintain suits to remedy an evil, to prevent an evil practice, is lodged in the bosom of persons who are concerned in the transaction, and where you can not get it out except by appealing to self-interest and getting somebody to turn informer. It is a disagreeable field upon which to enter. Anyone who has been charged with the conduct of Government prosecutions must have felt great repugnance in entering upon it, but it has been the experience and common judgment of all Governments that it is sometimes necessary. This seems to be a kind of an evil which can be reached only by this very disagreeable method.

In every case where you have recourse to informers you must recognize the fact that the appeal is not to the nobler impulses, and there is always opportunity for blackmail, but it is the choice between leaving the law unenforced and the evil to which the law is aimed at unredressed, on the one hand, or creating a situation in which the appeal to self-interest or of emolument to an informer will leave an opportunity to blackmail. There is a choice in it, but if you want the law enforced it is necessary that you shall have recourse to this old expedient, a qui tam action.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not agree with my distinguished colleague [Mr. ROOT] that this is the only alternative, that you must either encourage suits by informers or suffer the nonenforcement of the law. The Labor Department, with its tremendous power and instrumentalities, will never have any difficulty in ascertaining through its agents and its secret service whether the law is being enforced or violated. There are perhaps always ways of giving some reward to those who may be able to furnish information. I think that answers the main contention made by my colleague.

It is not necessary to conclude that this law can not be enforced. I believe it can be enforced and enforced by the department in charge of the responsibility of enforcing it, and where violations occur they will be punished in due course, first, by being exposed to a fine of a thousand dollars in each case in a suit brought by the Government, and in addition to that being subject to criminal prosecution. The language up to that point is sufficiently drastic, in my judgment, without going to a most extreme extent without a precedent in the history of this Government.

My colleague cites authorities which really do not apply here, where you might under certain circumstances feel it necessary to give to a citizen of the country the right to institute an informer's action. When before did we ever attempt to confer this right upon aliens coming here in violation of the law, aliens perhaps who might not be permitted to go beyond Castle Garden or the port at which they land, which is the cause of the violation; yet while at Castle Garden, acting under the influences of a designing attorney, they can under this language, if it be retained, commence individual civil actions seeking to recover a thousand dollars for every violation.

Mr. REED. The Senator has been a judge of distinction. Let me ask him if he does not believe it would be dangerous to justice itself to put witnesses upon the stand everyone of whom might have been made parties plaintiff in a suit and everyone of whom would receive a thousand dolllars in the event of a judgment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. By cooperating with one another?

Mr. REED. By cooperating with one another.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I think the main objection to this measure is the extent to which it may be used for purely blackmail purposes. Where there has been a real violation of the law there should not be much difficulty in the Labor Department through its agents ascertaining the violation and then having the Government begin its suit.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I understand it, this language is already in the law.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator if he knows whether under its operation and enforcement the things to which the Senator refers have actually occurred?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; I do not. The chairman of the committee states this provision has not been the subject of any consideration whatever by the Immigration Committee. It went through as a matter of course. The first time that this objectionable paragraph has received the attention of the Senate is this morning, when called to our attention by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

I have but one further word to say. Opinions may differ as to the advisability of permitting informers to be benefited financially as the result of information which they give to the authorities. There are those who think it is a very wise policy. There are those who condemn it. I think it is the judgment of most persons who have considered the subject that the evil associated with such laws far exceeds any possible benefit that may come from it.

The latest expression of this body on this identical subject was made some few months ago when we were discussing the antitrust legislation. The Senate, by its action with regard to that legislation, declared that it would not favor laws which could be made the instruments of blackmail, extortion, and oppression, because they minimized if they did not entirely exclude in the antitrust laws all possibility of informers profiting financially by information, true or false, that they might offer.

I have no hesitation in affirming that the average informer is so lost to moral responsibility, as a rule—there are exceptions, but as a rule—that he will not hesitate to perjure himself if by so doing he can bring money to his pocket.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the effect of permitting informers to assume this attitude has had consideration and has been the subject of legislation. Section 5295 of the Revised Statutes, passed shortly before there was general liberty granted to persons interested in litigation to testify, provides that—

> Any officer or other person entitled to or interested in a part or share of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under any law of the United States may be examined as a witness in any of the proceedings for the recovery of such fine, penalty, or forfeiture by either of the parties thereto, and such examination shall not deprive such witness of his share or interest in such fine, penalty, or forfeiture.

That registers, together with other sections, including the one referred to, the deliberate judgment of the Congress of the United States regarding cases of this kind.

My colleague was mistaken if he thought that I said this was the only way to enforce this statute. I have not said that, because I have not considered this statute; I have not thought about it; I have not considered whether or not there may be some other way. As my colleague says, that is quite natural, because this particular subject has not been considered at all with regard to the particular bill which is pending. I have merely interposed in this discussion for the purpose of putting the discussion on what I conceived to be the right basis; that is, not as a discussion of some new proposal but as the discussion of a desire to reverse a long-settled practice and policy of our Government in similar cases. It seemed to me that we were discussing this as if it were something new, when it is really but one form of putting into this proposed statute the old, old expedient of allowing a qui tam action, in which the informer can be induced to bring up his testimony by receiving all or a part of the penalty. I have merely read section 5295 of the Revised Statutes to show that the question of the effect of the interest upon the testimony of the informer has been considered and passed upon by the Congress and that their judgment has been embedded in the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not very favorably disposed toward the informer, but undoubtedly there are subjects which must be dealt with in that way. I do not think that this provides for the old qui tam action altogether, but there are two things here which, it seems to me, we ought to consider. Even if it is wise to stimulate prosecutions by giving to an informer some part of the recovery, it can not be wise to allow the informer to bring an independent suit, to be prosecuted by him according to his own pleasure. I have had some experience in my State with prosecutions of that character, and they do not tend to an enforcement of the law. On the contrary, they tend simply to the private profit of the informer.

If there should be any partition of the recovery, it should be a partition made by the Government of the recovery in a suit brought in its name, giving to the informer such part of the judgment as we might think it wise to give him.

But, as I look at this clause, it has another defect which is very much more serious. It will be observed that the action brought by the informer and the criminal action that might be instituted by the Government are in the alternative. A suit brought by the informer and a recovery by him would be a bar to any criminal prosecution under the law. That being true, the privilege given to the informer to bring the suit might be used to give criminal immunity to one who had violated the law under such circumstances as to make criminal punishment the only penalty that ought to be imposed.

Mark you how the clause reads:

> And for every violation of any of the provisions of this section the person, partnership, company, or corporation violating the same shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of $1,000, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States, or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit, including any such aliens thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the courts of the United States; or for every violation of the provisions hereof the person violating the same may be prosecuted in a criminal action for a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years.

It can not be that we desire to turn over to an informer, no matter whether he be a citizen or an alien, the privilege of determining whether the United States shall punish one who violates this section under the criminal part of the section. I therefore suggest to the chairman of the committee, who has this matter in charge, that either I have misconstrued it or that he must have overlooked it, for it is inconceivable to me that any such object is intended to be accomplished.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator's view is that if the action were brought by an informer for the forfeiture of a thousand dollars, that would preclude any criminal action for the enforcement of the provision?

Mr. CUMMINS. I so understand.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see it in that light. The provision reads:

> And for every violation of any of the provisions of this section the person, partnership, company, or corporation violating the same shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of $1,000, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States, or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit, including any such aliens thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the courts of the United States; or for every violation of the provisions hereof the person violating the same may be prosecuted in a criminal action for a misdemeanor.

You may bring a civil suit or there may be a criminal action at the same time.

Mr. CUMMINS. But there can not be both.

Mr. BORAH. Why not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Because the word "or" precludes it, unless that word is construed, as it sometimes is, I grant, as the equivalent of the word "and."

Mr. BORAH. I do not think so. You could not introduce a civil judgment as a bar in a criminal suit. The use of the word "or" does not have the effect, in my judgment, of limiting to one cause of action.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I suggest, if the Senator will permit me, that this being a highly penal statute, it would be strictly construed and not extended. It is perfectly plain to me as it now reads that the Senator from Iowa is right.

Mr. CUMMINS. From my standpoint the interpretation seems to be clear; but, even if it is not clear, the matter is of such moment that I am sure those who favor the informer system would not be willing to substitute that method for the enforcement of the criminal law of the country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I will ask him if it would meet his suggestion if, beginning with line 19, after the words "United States," the word "or" should be changed to "and," so as to coordinate the two and make both criminal and civil procedure possible?

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean to say that the language should make it entirely certain that the informer, if that feature of the bill is to be preserved, might bring his suit, and at the same time the Government of the United States might indict and punish by imprisonment or fine if it so desired.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. ROOT. I rose to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that there have been for a great many years double proceedings continually going on under the laws of the United States. One marked example is the case of the United States against Boyd, which is a rather well-known leading case, although I do not remember the volume in which that case is found.
